A great deal of interest is taken by local automobilists in the race meet of the Automobile Club of Southern California which opened in Los Angeles yesterday. Barney Oldfield is no doubt to be the centre of attraction. The champion, after trying for new records at San Jose last Sunday, left for Los Angeles with the two racing cars of the Winton Motor Carriage Company. Both the "Bullet No. 2" and the "Baby Bullet" will be entered in competitive races. The National Automobile Company, early in the week, shipped the Toledo touring car which distinguished itself so greatly at the Ingleside races, to Los Angeles, where it is to be entered against the forty-five horse-power Mercedes in which Foxhall Keene broke a number of American records last year. It will be a race for an American stock machine of less than five thousand dollars against a twenty-two thousand dollar carriage of French make, and if the Toledo wins it will be a feather in the cap of American manufacturers. The Toledo, after the races at Los Angeles, will be delivered to a Los Angeles millionaire who has purchased the speedy car. The speedy little four-cylinder Franklin owned by Messrs. Fred A. Jacobs and E. Courtney Ford will also be entered at Los Angeles. This car should make a great record as it alone carried off six prizes at the Automobile Club of California's meet. The two "Whites" that raced at Ingleside, the stock touring car operated so successfully by Walter Grothe and the racer run by F. D. Hyde, are both at Los Angeles.

The National Automobile Company is in receipt of specifications of the Rambler line of automobiles for 1904, and it is certainly one of the most complete ever offered to the public. It consists of two styles of runabouts, three styles of tonneau touring cars, and a delivery wagon.

Dr. and Mrs. Russel H. Cool have gone to Los Angeles to attend the automobile races. The Doctor is the owner of a Toledo touring car and watches the success of that machine with great interest.

The National company expects to receive a Knox air-cooled touring car within the next few days. This machine has been sold to P. George Gow. This is a new departure in touring cars and will attract a great deal of attention from automobilists in and around San Francisco.

Three carloads of White touring cars arrived in San Francisco within the past week, and two carloads also reached Los Angeles. These have been sold in advance, and among the San Francisco purchasers are Magnus Kjelsburg, Miss K. Dillon, Mr. A. W. Wilson and Mr. F. A. Hyde. Mr. Magnus Kjelsburg had his first ride in his new White touring car last Sunday. Although this was his first experience, he mastered the car immediately, and was soon running it himself—very little instruction being necessary.

Walter Grothe, in his "White" touring car, established three new world's records for stock touring cars of American manufacture at Ingleside: 1:09 4-5 for one mile, 2:19 3-5 for two miles and 6:04 2-5 for five miles. —The Chauffeur.

The "White" Automobile and Its Reliability

The following comments on the performance of the WHITE in the Endurance Run, made by impartial observers, should convince the most skeptical that the WHITE is King:

Quotation from The Automobile of October seventeenth, 1903, page 392:

"Five WHITE steamers started from Wehawken Wednesday morning and all of them arrived here tonight, at the end of two days, among the first thirteen out of seventeen arrivals, the three entered in the test arriving among the first ten, a record that has put a pleased expression on W. T. White's countenance. As a demonstration of the ability of the WHITE tonneau to negotiate hills and bad roads, this showing could only be surpassed by the marvelous."

A prominent automobile authority, writing in the Buffalo Express of October eighteenth, of the finish of the great Endurance Contest at Pittsburg on the sixteenth, had the following to say:

"It was beautiful to see the WHITE steamer come up with a mighty rush. It had traveled the eight hundred odd miles from New York with the other pilot car and the two cars had marked the way for all the contestants. Both did all or more than had been expected or hoped. They stood side by side at the finish. Then came the WHITE Car. No. 5 at 11:55 o'clock, the first in of all the contestants, traveling swiftly and with marvelous ease; the COLUMBIA No. 2 at 12:22 o'clock: then the WHITE No. 6 at 13:34. The WHITE steamers truly were scoring."

Note.— Mr. Augustus Post, in his Touring Car, was the first of the contestants that left New York to arrive at the finish, having come in hours ahead of the pilot car. W. T. White in his WHITE pilot was second; Webb Jay in his WHITE No. 5 was third; and P. H. Deming in WHITE No. 6 was fifth; thereby giving the WHITE Cars first, second, third and fifth places among the finishers in the great Endurance Contest.

Many of the high-powered and high priced gasoline cars, some of them selling for more than double the price of the WHITE and claiming several times the horse-power, made great showings the first two days. The reliability of the WHITE began to show as the race progressed, and WHITE No. 5, driven by Webb Jay, made the best actual running time between Buffalo and the finish of the race at Pittsburg, by one hour, thereby showing what splendid condition the WHITE Cars were in at the finish of the race, and how the gasoline cars had deteriorated by comparison, over the same roads.

In figuring the percentages of the performance of various types of cars in the Endurance Contest, it will be noted that four of the WHITE cars finished in such time and under such conditions as would qualify for a first class certificate, to-wit: W. T. White in his pilot car, Mr. Augustus Post in his private car, Webb Jay in No. 5, and T. H. Deming in No. 6; and besides the fact that they finished four of the first five cars, they constituted four out of the nine cars which so finished, the other five being scattered among various makes of gasoline cars, thus giving the WHITES 80 per cent (the WHITE Car No. 4 having been disabled by an accident, was withdrawn), while of the gasoline cars, only five finished in such time as to qualify for first class certificates, out of a total of thirty starters; making an average per cent for gasoline cars of 16 2-3, as against an average for the WHITE of 80 per cent. If this showing does not prove the WHITE the car to buy for ordinary everyday use, independent of the fact that it takes far less repairs and is far simpler to operate, that it is noiseless and chainless, has no exhaust or vibration, and is sold for less than half the price of any gasoline car built capable of anything near as good a performance, then we would respectfully inquire what kind of evidence is wanted. As further evidence, however, we would state that the WHITE Touring Car made the first and second best showing of any American car in the English Reliability Trials at the Crystal Palace, London, during October, 1903 the White made the first best showing at the same trials last year, and the WHITE also made the highest score in the the American Endurance Trials last year.

The WHITE won twelve prizes at the Ingleside race meet, defeating gasoline machines of two to ten times the selling price, and established three new world's records. New models now on sale.

Cupid at a Rummage Sale

"Why, certainly, you can have my cast-off suits for your rummage sale. Wait a second, and I'll phone my man to have them sent down directly."

"Send them to the hall, please, and oh, dear Mr. Conness, I thank you so much."

Mrs. Arnold beamed her most genial smile upon George Conness, who thought he was getting rid of the charitable society woman very easily with the gift of his old clothes. Generally, Mrs. Arnold asked for cheques with two ciphers, and he always hated to refuse her. For was she not Sylvia Arnold's aunt?

To be sure, Sylvia had treated him shamefully. After two weeks of rapturous engagement, with the wedding day almost set, she had written him a cold note calling the betrothal off and requesting the return of her letters. He had sent them at once, and she had returned his, with the ring and his gifts which included a blooded French bull-pup. He wondered how Sylvia could have returned the dog; she had always appeared to love the canine. Gerald had not the slightest idea of how he had offended his fiancee, and he had never been permitted an opportunity to discover the reason. He wondered if Mrs. Arnold knew, but it would not have done to talk over Sylvia in his office with the stenographer within ear-reach.

Gerald settled himself to his law-books. Two hours later, the telephone bell rang.

"Miss Arnold desires to speak to you," said the stenographer.

* * * * * * * *

This is where an explanation is due:

* * * * * * * *

"Mr. Conness must be terribly extravagant," observed Mrs. Brown, "to throw away clothes like these. Why, this tuxedo is as good as new. My husband's isn't in any later style."

"Goodness! what's this?"

Miss Green was rummaging in the pockets of a morning coat. She drew forth a tiny jeweler's box.

"A solitaire! Why, I wonder what Mr. Conness's man was thinking about?"

She put the ring on her finger, and danced about the room.

Mrs. Church was meanwhile delving into another pocket of the same coat. She drew forth a package of letters.

"That valet must be awfully remiss," she said, "why, look at these."

Sylvia Arnold, who had been paying but indifferent attention to the doings of the committee to provide Thanksgiving dinners for the needy by means of a rummage sale, looked up, at this. Her eyes flashed as she snatched the package from Mrs. Brown's hands.

"How dare you!" she cried, "how dare you—" for Mrs. Brown had half-opened one of the missives—"how dare you read my letters?"

Sylvia's eyes filled with angry tears as her aunt reproved her for her vehemence.

"I didn't know they were yours," said Mrs. Brown with a shrug of her aristocratic shoulders, "they were in Mr. Conness's coat, and he gave us the coat to sell. Perhaps that is yours, too," she added, indicating Miss Green, who was still holding up her finger to admiring gaze of its ornament.

But Sylvia had gone, with the old gray coat and the letters. She was in the office of the hired hall, at the phone.

* * * * * * * *

"How could you be so careless? Why, Geor—Mr. Conness, I never heard of anything so utterly horrid. Miss Green has the ring—my ring—on at this moment. Dismiss your man? Oh, what good would that do? Will I tell you all about it? Why, you know, George. It was that Slaven girl—she told me she saw you dining with a—horrid—woman—with—red—hair. Your cousin from Chicago? Why didn't you tell me? No chance? Well, what could I do? Well, come over here right away—I'll wait."

And then Sylvia buried her tearful face in the old gray coat.

* * * * * * * *

"Why, yes, Mrs. Brown," said Mr. Conness as he met that lady at the door. "I said the clothes and everything. Of course I thought Lamson would clean the pockets out first, but if he didn't—well, it's my loss. Certainly, Miss Green, sell the ring if you like. It will buy a lot of Thanksgiving dinners, won't it?"

To Sylvia, as in the dingy office they made their peace, he added:

"Never mind, darling. You never fancied solitaires, anyway, and you can pick out a stone you like better. Bless the old rummage sale, I say. But tell me, dear, why you sent the dog back?"

Sylvia smiled as she answered:

"Why, I couldn't bear to have him around. Don't you know, boy, he had a smile—just—like—yours?"

My Mamma's Model

Yes, I must confess that I have lost much of my respect for white hair; besides, there are many antique gentlemen who dye their locks, possibly because they do not feel worthy of them; and even for those who do not dye them, it is impossible for me to entertain in their regard that superstitious veneration which the Gaulish soldiers felt for the Roman senator, seated on his curelean chair—a veneration, I may add, which lasted until the said soldier had decided to pull the senatorial beard.

So what can you expect from me? I was a mere youth when, figuratively speaking, I held in my hand that venerated beard—not indeed the beard of a Roman senator, but the reputation of an old and esteemed friend of my mother's, Monsieur Torvilliers, a notary, who frequently visited us at the chateau, during the vacations, and who acted as my guardian at Paris.

In appearance, Monsieur Torvilliers was tall and slender. Slightly bald on the top of his head, his long white locks formed a sort of aureole around his smooth-shaven face; habitually dressed in black, his serious air and manner inspired respect and esteem. At home, the very mention of Monsieur Torvillier's name caused us to bow our heads; and mamma, whose business affairs he had attended to for an eternity, swore by the good Monsieur Torvilliers.

Whenever yours truly deviated from the straight and narrow path, it was always Monsieur Torvilliers who was deputed to administer the reprimand.

He acquitted himself of this duty in a most admirable manner, selecting his words with great care, and punctuating his lecture with a bewildering array of Latin quotations.

This particular year, my vacation had been unusually disagreeable. To begin with, I had returned home, after having been refused my baccalaureate. My reception, therefore, was rather chilling. To console myself, I began an ardent flirtation with Louise, the pretty house-maid. One evening at dusk I was discovered, by my small brother, truly an "enfant terrible," kissing Louise, in a dark corner on an upper floor. The maid, for her mansuetude in my regard, was promptly dismissed. The day after this terrible episode, Monsieur Torvilliers arrived from Paris, and for two hours by the clock we were closeted together. He spoke to me of Cato, comparing the purity and nobility of his life with that of the dissolute Anthony, who always wore his toga loose and flowing. According to the virtuous Torvilliers, my general deportment was strongly suggestive of the decadent Roman. I had not even respected the family hearth-stone. My conduct, he declared, was worthy of the most disgraceful days of the Lower Empire—for I had attempted to corrupt a simple country maid.

To be candid, his lecture bored me. Yet I was obliged to listen to him, with a contrite and penitent air; at the same time I must acknowledge that he spoke with grace and dignity, and the note of sadness in his voice recalled the "Vir bonus bene decendi peritus," so often alluded to by my professors.

When the vacations ended, I returned to Paris under the paternal wing of Monsieur Torvilliers. As we journeyed onward I was forced to listen to a new sermon on several very important points hitherto untouched upon. Happily, the stops en route afforded a few minutes' respite.

Torvilliers, always strong on the classics, recalled the story of the dangerous Circe, who changed men into swine; of Hercules, who one day found himself facing two roads, one leading to vice, and the other leading to virtue. The vicious road, strewn with roses, was soft and agreeable, commented my guardian, while that leading to virtue was rough and stony, bristling with thorns, briars and brambles—yet Hercules followed the thorny path.

As the train rushed along, I began to philosophize. Why, I asked myself, is virtue always presented to us under such a disagreeable aspect? And why is not the road to virtue sweetly perfumed, and strewn with flowers?

My reflections had reached this stage when we arrived at Paris. It was a misty, foggy October evening. Hailing a cab, we jumped in, and ordered the cabman to drive to the rue Lhomond.

Through the carriage windows Paris appeared to me like an enchanted city. The entire length of the Boulevard Strasbourg was one continuous line of fairy-like illuminations; the cafe terraces bristled with life and gayety—the restless populace, on pleasure bent, rushed hurriedly by us; mingling with the crowds were scores of pretty women, lively, vivacious little creatures, leaving in their wake a world of perfumes and desires.

This is, I thought, the broad and easy road, strewn with flowers and redolent of roses. I felt sure that even Hercules himself would have hesitated, as I did, to enter the dark and gloomy quarters of the rue Lhomond.

The cab climbed Soufflot street. We passed the Pantheon, erected to glorify the memory of the great men of France; Monsieur Torvilliers seized this opportunity for another tirade in my behalf. Finally the carriage passed the house formerly occupied by the Jesuits, and drew up at the institute door. I raised the heavy knocker, which gave back a most lugubrious sound.

"Good-bye, my young friend," cried Monsieur Torvilliers, as soon as the door opened. "Reflect upon what I have said. Next Sunday I shall call for you, and after we have breakfasted we will attend a classical matinee at the Theatre Francais."

The carriage drove off, and I found myself face to face with the concierge. "Why did you return tonight?" he asked. "The college does not open until tomorrow evening."

This unexpected news gave me an electric shock. I did not, however, manifest the slightest agitation. "Yes, I am aware of that fact," I replied with assurance. "I merely called to secure my room, No. 12—the large one overlooking the street."

"It shall be reserved for you. Good-night, sir"—and the honest Cerberus, without the slightest suspicion, closed the door, and I found myself, at nine o'clock in the evening, on the rue Lhomond, at liberty to spend the night wherever I pleased.

This unexpected happiness quite upset me. However, I quickly recovered myself, and remembering that I had saved a neat little sum during the six weeks of vacation, I decided to spend the evening at the Folies-Bergere. Arriving there, I excitedly patroled its luxuriously carpeted corridors, resplendent with mirrors and gildings, and thronged with beautiful women, exquisitely gowned. In a moment the example of Cato was a far-away memory, while the heroic conduct of Hercules, the thorny path, and the virtuous Torvilliers were entirely forgotten. My mood was most decidedly in the Lower Empire vein.

I glanced around, and soon discovered in the throng my twin soul, the mistress of my dreams, in the person of a tall, graceful Italian girl, with languid brown eyes, daintily gowned in crimson chiffon. Our admiration appeared to be mutual. She graciously accepted my invitation to have wine, and we installed ourselves in the grand hall.

Ah, how happy I felt! Lucia was all smiles and gayety. To make sure of her not giving me the slip, our libations were frequent and generous—hence, when the orchestra played the good-night, and the lights began to be extinguished, I found myself with one solitary piece of money, which pride and custom compelled me to hand over to the waiter.

"Good-night, my little darling," said my companion, when we reached the street. "You are real cunning; I will see you again."

"What!" I exclaimed in desperation, "are you not going to permit me to escort you to your apartments?"

"No, not this evening, my handsome baby. Call on me some time during the week. Here is my address. Bye-bye—" and Lucia stepped into her waiting cab, and heartlessly drove away.

For the moment, I was strongly tempted to play highwayman and hold up the waiter. What was to become of me? I had not the price of a night's lodging. My falsehood to the concierge had closed the college doors against me. The October air was chilling. Suddenly, I felt the key of my guardian's residence in my pocket. Better lodge with him, I thought, than beneath the stars. The concierge would certainly corroborate my story.

Woefully disappointed, I walked towards the rue Chaussee-d'Antin. Noiselessly, I entered my guardian's house, intending to step through the dining-room to the apartment always reserved for me. The passage, however, was barred—for there sat Monsieur Torvilliers, with Lucia, sipping champagne!

I stood a few minutes and watched them, and as I passed into my own room, I thought: How like Anthony, how unlike Cato! Conduct truly worthy of the decadent days of the Lower Empire! Ah, my poor deluded mamma! Will she ever believe the story true?

Renascence of Nolan

One might have supposed that such a story as Edward Everett Hale's "Man Without a Country" would be let alone, and that if a would-be authoress could find no other topic with which to engage her pen she would restrict her activities to the darning needle and the stocking basket. Not so, however. One Carlen Balison, who is, as a matter of course, an infant phenomenon in the writing line, has taken Philip Nolan as her hero, and fitted him out with a complete set of frontier incidents of the wild bandit type. There are shiploads of pearls, crown jewels, cypher messages, and a royal princess mixed into the melange which she calls "The Man in the Camlet Cloak." "The Man Without a Country" is one of those facts built upon fiction which literature has occasionally supplied. The author says the only basis it had in reality was that Burr sailed down the Mississippi in 1805 and was tried for treason in 1807, and that General Wilkinson, in the volume which he dignified by the title of "Memoirs," had an easy way of extricating himself from bogs by explaining that the papers relating to the charge were lost when Mr. Nolan, his partner, was imprisoned in Texas. Mr. Hale says the story passed out of his hands when it was published, in 1863, and the explanations, embellishments and apologies are entirely apart from him. All he meant to do was to give a lesson in patriotism in the darkest days of the Civil War. It has been asserted by some persons connected with the Navy Department, that the supposititious Philip Nolan was pardoned, and returned to die in the United States. Another department declared that the exiled officer was not named Nolan. A venerable resident of Boston was sure he remembered the "Nolan court-martial," and still another assured Mr. Hale that he remembered reading the death notice in the newspaper. A Baltimore lady professed to be a friend of Nolan's two widowed sisters, and another correspondent disputed the whole story, since the U. S. frigate Levant was lost three years before it was mentioned in the tale. Still another, a correspondent of a New Orleans paper, asserted that Nolan was banished to Texas and shot there in battle in 1801. Now comes this raw school girl to turn the imaginary Nolan into a sort of Jesse James.

The Editing of Manuscript

Andy Adams's "Log of a Cowboy" is so unquestionably genuine as an account of a cowboy experience, and so simply and straightforwardly told, that the most carping and ill-natured of critics can find no fault with it as a book—unless exception is taken to the title, for the cowboy keeps no log, and the account is not made in log-form. But some people there are in this world who can never be satisfied. They must look for the pea under their forty featherbeds, and so, some cross-cut crank has made "The Log of a Cowboy" the text of a sermon in which he preaches against cowboys, sailors, and others of the non-literary fraternity, who write up their experiences and then "have them polished off by some one who never smelt sagebrush." As it happens, the bullet so neatly aimed does not hit Andy Adams at all, for he is in no need of a professional polisher, but as to the matter itself, one would like to ask what harm if copy is edited? It is one thing to appropriate matter, or to hire a name in order to pose as a "lit'r'y person." It is quite another to solicit mechanical help, whether it be paid for in coin or given out of good feeling and interest. After reading Frank Bullen's "Log of a Sea Waif," for example, no one would be at all surprised to find the author weak in orthography and English grammar, or ignorant of punctuation. But we do not read Mr. Bullen's books because his schooling was almost a minus quantity, and if, as our carping critic asserts, some one else polishes off the products of his pen, so much the better. Many of us who have read and re-read and re-enjoyed "The Cruise of the Cachalot" as it now appears, would have dropped it before ten pages, had we been obliged to wade through a mass of ill-spelt, uncapitalized, unpunctuated bad grammar. The loss would have been ours of course, but the fault would have been in the presentation of printed matter in such shape. Instead of going out of his way to find fault with what he merely surmises to be the case, our critic would have done better if he had commended the example to the authors of those crude, weak, ill-written books which are foisted upon us. The lack of elementary criticism is one of the most astonishing things about books of this day. Orthography we may blame on the compositor. He is used to it by this time. But grammar—shades of Goold Brown and Lindley Murray! It is only by accident that the correlation of either-or, neither-nor, so-as, and as-as is maintained, and let the simplest modifier obtrude between the compound subject and its predicate, and there is chaos. If there is a preposition within sight of the relative who, it becomes whom as a matter of course, while an inversion which throws the objective before its governing word deprives it of its m without process of law. As a specimen of ignorant impudence combined with vandalism, and an example of the capacity of the average person to write without revision, in a copy of "Other Things Being Equal" I find this sentence, as the author Miss Emma Wolf, wrote it: "Every one but me seems to have seen that something was wrong." Some impertinent busybody, pencil in hand, has "corrected' the statement to read, "Every one but I seem to have seen that something was wrong." Let us imagine, if such a thing is possible, that the one whose itching fingers has perpetrated this piece of vandalism had the brain capacity to think thoughts and express them in written words. What sort of a jumble would she have produced? What right would she have to present her crude and indigestible rubbish to a reading public? On the other hand, suppose that her thoughts were good, her ideas original, or even that she had the constructive ability to produce a readable novel, why should it be sent out ill-dressed, in fringes and tatters, when some kind soul with needle, thimble and scissors could clip and stitch it into presentable shape? Nine-tenths of the books that are published need just the kind of editing—correcting, they called it in those days—that the old-fashioned schoolmaster used to mete out to the weekly "composition." Within reasonable bounds, there is no more deception about having a book properly edited than there is in having a garment pressed by a tailor. To rewrite chapters or passages is one thing; to bring about an agreement between the parts of a sentence, to corral straying modifiers and tie them up where they belong, to strike out tautological expressions, and guide the author in recasting his obscure and ill-constructed sentences, is no more a matter to be complained of than is washing the faces of dirty children. It does not hurt them, and it adds comfort to all who come in contact with them.

No one who knows anything about Charles Reade would ever class him among the modest violets, for it is well known that if he suffered from lack of appreciation it was no fault of his own. The Bookman reprints from Once a Week a cartoon portrait with a most fulsomely flattering article on the author, which combines admiration for Reade with disparagement of George Eliot, and accusations of plagiarism set forth through the agency of the deadly parallel column. The whole thing is pitched on the key of the campaign editorial in which Reade is IT and every one else nowhere. Naturally the conclusion is that it was the product of some enthusiastic partisan of the author, and so it was. "The reason why it has seemed worth while to rescue this paper from the oblivion of the back number and to reprint it here in full is that it was written by Charles Reade himself in his own hand."

Another idol has fallen. Maurice Maeterlinck, who, such a short while ago, was hailed as the "Belgian Shakespeare," presented a new play in Brussels a week or so ago, "The Miracle of St. Anthony," and it was heartily hissed by the audience. From accounts that have reached us, it does not appear to have been much of a play, and perhaps foreign authors accept their hissings and "booings" philosophically, as part of the game, but the American plan of staying away from a theatre which presents a poor show would seem to be quite as effective and in better breeding.

The Still Small Voice of Gratitude

First of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men.—I Timothy, ii:1

The Collect: O most merciful Father, who hast blessed the labours of the husbandman in the returns of the fruits of the earth; We give thee humble and hearty thanks for this thy bounty; beseeching thee to continue thy loving-kindness to us; that our land may still yield her increase, to thy glory and our comfort.—Episcopal Prayer Book.

This is the law of the sacrifice of peace offerings, which he shall offer unto the Lord. If he offer it for a thanksgiving, then he shall offer with the sacrifice of thanksgiving unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and unleavened wafers anointed with oil, and cakes mingled with oil, of fine flour, fried. Besides the cakes, he shall offer for his offering leavened bread with the sacrifice of thanksgiving of his peace offerings. And of it he shall offer one out of the whole oblation for an heave offering unto the Lord. . . And when ye will offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving unto the Lord, offer it at your own will.—Leviticus, vii: 11-14; xxii: 29.

Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase; so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine.—Proverbs, iii: 9, 10.

Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. —Phil. iv: 6.

If ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do the same. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again.—Luke vi: 33, 34.

For this relief much thanks.—Hamlet.

Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks.—Hamlet.

To the generous mind
The heaviest debt is that of gratitude,
When 'tis not in our power to repay it.
—Franklin's "Matilda."

A grateful mind
By owing owes not, but still pays, at once
Indebted and discharged.
Milton's "Paradise Lost."

He that hath nature in him, must be grateful;
'Tis the Creator's primary great law
That links the chain of beings to each other.
Madden's "Themistocles."

The gratitude of place-expectants is a lively sense of future favours.—Sir Robert Walpole.

When I'm not thank'd at all, I'm thanked enough.
I've done my duty, and I've done no more. —Henry Fielding.

Squelching of Livernash

The squelching of Mr. Livernash, of the Fourth District, on the occasion of his debut in Congress, was more emphatic and dramatic than the press despatches represented. It appears from a transcript of the proceedings in the Congressional Record, that the labor agitator undertook to overwhelm Congress by the same south-of-the-slot tactics that served to reveal his true character on the occasion of the reorganization meeting of Democrats in this city some months ago. That was the occasion on which Mr. Livernash damned himself politically by traducing the friends to whom he was indebted for his rise from obscurity, actuated though he was solely by a desire to aggrandize his political power. Mr. Livernash is a lawyer of considerable ability, and in this neck of the woods he is rated an exceptionally sharp-witted young man. But when he matched his wits against Hon. Joseph G. Cannon, Speaker of the House, he soon found that he was up against his intellectual master. When the provincial Congressman rose to a question of privilege, and caught the Speaker's eye with his own hypnotic orb, he was prepared to shake the gallery with the eloquence of his maiden Congressional effort. He contemplated a strategic attack on the Administration under the guise of a question of privilege, "affecting the rights of the whole House." He had a resolution, but wanted to make a stump speech before introducing it. No doubt he had friends staked out in the gallery to applaud. He began by saying that the President's action in the Panama affair was tantamount to a declaration of war. He was about to analyze the relations of the United States with Colombia when he was interrupted by Hon. Sereno Payne, Republican leader of the floor. Mr. Payne said that it was evident that Mr. Livernash had no question of privilege, and that at any rate he should state it before spellbinding. Livernash started afresh, but was interrupted by the Speaker, who reminded him that he was not stating a question of privilege; that he was confounding personal privilege with privilege affecting the house, in the method of his procedure. Mr. Cannon cited the rule showing that in stating a question of privilege affecting the House he must first have his resolution read. Livernash thereupon informed the Speaker that his resolution was of such a character that it could not be offered until his question of privilege had first been stated. Mr. Cannon deftly closed the discussion with this statement: "If the gentleman is so unfortunate as not to be able to embody in a resolution in writing, for the information of the House, his question of privilege, he is unable to conform to the rules of the House, as the chair understands the matter." Mr. Livernash resumed his seat with a dull thud.

The Promotion of Leonard Wood

President Roosevelt's promotion of his friend, General Leonard Wood, is not to be confirmed by the Senate without an investigation. Specific charges of a scandalous nature have been made against General Wood and indignation is intense in army circles over the injustice to the hundreds of honorable and experienced officers who have been wronged by the favoritism of the President. Roosevelt has been subjected to adverse criticism for many of his official acts, but none of them is more difficult of justification than that by which General Wood, a physician, of comparatively little experience in military tactics and scarcely any in the field, was promoted over the heads of numerous officers who had seen long and arduous service, and who were entitled to the gratitude of their country. The injustice to those officers is especially severe because Wood is a young man, and if his promotion be ratified he will soon become the commander of the army, and stay the progress of many who will go on the retired list before attaining the rank to which in the natural order of things they would, in time, be elevated. To assist one's friends is praiseworthy, and even a man occupying the exalted position of President of the United States should not be expected to distribute all patronage solely with an eye to efficiency. It is characteristic of the noble-hearted to discriminate in favor of those to whom they are grateful, and that may be done by a President without seriously impairing the public service. But there is one branch of the public service in which considerations of friendship should not enter, and that is the military. There are responsibilities devolving on the President, so far as the army is concerned, which it were unwise for him to disregard. To elevate an incompetent man to the position of commander of the army is an outrage, the extent of which cannot be reckoned until the lives of soldiers have been sacrificed. General Wood may be innocent of the charges of personal unworthiness that have been made against him, but that he is not a trained soldier is a fact that is not disputed.

The Persistence of Rathbone

One of the principal witnesses against Wood, and the man in whom the opposition places great confidence, is Estes G. Rathbone, who was convicted in Havana of charges of conspiracy to defraud the Cuban Government then under American control. He was released under an amnesty bill after having refused a proposal for his pardon. He declined pardon on the ground that its acceptance would be construed into an acknowledgment of the guilt which he denied. If he is a criminal he is a man of remarkable effrontery. He emerged from prison declaring his purpose to devote the remainder of his life, if necessary, to the securing of a new trial of his case and the establishment of his innocence. He returned to this country and appealed for a Congressional investigation of his case. The matter was referred to a Senate committee in whose hands it still remains. A man conscious of his own guilt would naturally hesitate in taking the risk of having his crime positively fastened upon him, but Rathbone is earnest and persistent in his demand for an investigation. He charges Wood with having persecuted him, and declares that he has ample proof that the President's friend interfered in the proceedings of the court during his trial. He preferred serious charges of personal misconduct against Wood, but President Roosevelt declined to give him a hearing. Now that the Senate has held up the matter of Wood's confirmation the probability is that Rathbone will be given a chance to tell his story.

The Value of Slang

A solemn critic has been taking some of our leading literary men to task for their too "kindly and receptive spirit toward the use of slang." One of the sinners is that highly cultured gentleman, Mr. William Dean Howells, who has garnished his latest book, "Letters Home," with an abundance of slang trimmings. His critic thinks that there is danger of our language being vitiated by the use of slang, and also that our literary men will mark their books for oblivion by using too much of it. Professor Brander Matthews, on the other hand, fears we do not use enough slang, and solemnly warns all of us against purism. Professor Matthews is right. The so-called stylist and purist who abhors slang is the most deadly dull of all writers. He is much more likely to mark his books for oblivion than is the writer skilled in the art of using slang judiciously and luminously. The purist is often stilted and vague. The stylist is often mechanical and obscure. The artist in slang is forceful and expressive and his writings have a piquancy and vivacity that constitute a charm which compels attention. Neither Dickens nor Shakespeare marked his works for oblivion by the use of slang. On the contrary, they employed it to advantage. True, the great mass of slang is ephemeral, but much of the slang of Shakespeare and Dickens is now idiomatic and is no longer registered among the irregularities of the language. Writing that abounds in slang is vulgar and offensive, but to contend that it may not be employed judiciously to good effect is absurd.

Curative Power of Radium

The most important and at the same time the most remarkable discovery in science in recent years is that of radium, or rather of certain phenomena of radium, the nature of which scientists are as yet unable to explain. The remarkable feature of radium is that it can emit both rays and heat without showing the least loss of substance, but people in general are not interested so much in the phenomena of radium as they are in the uses to which it may be put. The unscientific public is eager to know whether it is likely to be effective as a curative agent. So far as investigations seem to show, the new substance exercises its greatest influence on the eye and the skin. It has already been found that if radium is placed before the eye, which has been closed and heavily bandaged, the eye immediately sees very vivid light in consequence of the direct irritation of the retina. From experiments made thus far it appears that it is only in those cases in which the perception of light is not completely destroyed that radium can be of any use in the treatment of sightlessness. The afflicted person must not be so blind that he cannot say, from his own perceptions, whether it is day or night. Experiments have been made to test the effect of radium on bacteria, and there is grave doubt whether it will ever be capable of exercising, to any appreciable extent, a deleterious influence upon the development of certain species of bacteria. However, from a biological and physiological point of view, its action on the skin in general and upon certain morbid growths in particular is especially noteworthy. So far two facts have been established beyond doubt: that when brought into contact with the skin, it produces serious lesions and severe inflammation in which the deeper structures of the skin are involved; and that its effect upon malignant growths, including the different malignant varieties of lupus, is highly beneficial, inasmuch as it relieves the tension of the skin and stimulates, by means of the active afflux of blood, the local metabolism. Furthermore, it is claimed that it promotes the softening and ultimate absorption of the nodules.

A Troublesome Picture

The camera has played havoc with the peace and dignity of a Presbyterian church in Chicago. The pastor of the church is the Rev. D. B. Greigg, and he is the central figure in a very hot factional fight, the result of an indiscretion on his part which was perpetuated by a photograph. Some time ago he went swimming in the surf at Manhattan Beach, and he was accompanied by several female members of his choir. Somebody caught a snapshot of him standing on the beach in his bathing suit, surrounded by the girls in the picturesque costume in which they had been swimming. Lost by the photographer and found by a grave and puritanical elder of the church, the picture has stirred up a bitter conflict. Horrified at the depiction of his pastor attired in a bathing suit and standing with folded arms in the centre of a bevy of young women in the orthodox abbreviated costume of the seaside, the elder showed the picture to other holy men, and by degrees indignation has spread until the prospect looms of a fight in the Chicago Presbytery. Of course the pastor contends that he did no wrong, but the leaders of the opposing faction argue that the photograph is proof of his shocking indifference to the proprieties. They do not condemn him for making a public appearance in a bathing suit, or for signifying his approval of the mixed-bathing practice, but they think that the ensemble scene on the shore was unpardonable. In their opinion it betrayed a lack of delicacy wholly inconsistent with his sacred calling.

A Criminal Nuisance

Justice Julius Meyer of New York has put himself on record as favoring some sort of press censorship which will result in putting an end to the advertisements of quack medicines and of mediums, clairvoyants, palmists, masseuses, manicures and others who, under the guise of more or less miraculous power, really practice medicine or surgery. Something of the same kind would be welcome on our coast quite as much as in the larger metropolis, and at the same time a law should be so framed as to prohibit the distribution by mail or by private hand, of illustrated medical almanacs and pamphlets. The advertising cards which are printed in the newspapers are not apt to attract the attention of those who are not in search of them, but the booklets thrown about door yards and front steps fall into the hands of children who can barely read, but whose imagination is stimulated by the pictures. In these days when everything is exploited to the full in the newspapers, and biology is introduced into the kindergarten, parents who have old-fashioned ideas on the subject of over-sophistication of their little ones are hard put to it to preserve their innocence at best. They may exercise the utmost care about conversation in the presence of children, oversee their books and plays and supervise their companionship; they may ward off questions and be wary about answers, but in an age when the baby in arms is child-cultured, and the toddler taking his first steps is taught to propagate earth-worms, it is a matter of no small difficulty to succeed even approximately. It has happened in more than one household that the baby has treasured some wretched pamphlet, and when it has been surreptitiously abstracted and destroyed there has been a wail for "the book with the pictures of broken people in it," while the children of larger growth have spelled out descriptions of diseases and symptoms, set their imagination to work, and demanded doses to save them from death. If it were only a matter of clean streets and orderly dooryards this wholesale distribution of dodgers and other printed matter ought to be declared a misdemeanor, but when the contents of these quack pamphlets are taken into consideration, it is nothing short of crime.

The Academic Faddist

Professor Harper, of the Chicago University, is jubilant over what he considers to be the prospect of high schools extending their courses to five and six years and doing much of the work that is now left to the college and university. Presumably the college course will continue to be four years, and the additional training of the athletes will, in the professorial mind, add to the general worth of the college-trained man. Of course, viewed from the standpoint of the college and the college professor, it will be an excellent thing to have the advantages of more muscle in the foot-ball frays and more power to the yell. There is, however, another view. In these days of early superannuation, when few commercial concerns or manufacturing businesses will accept new men over thirty-five years of age, and when a man ten years over that, unless he has a competence to maintain him, might as well turn tramp as try to look for work, who is going to maintain these husky youths in idleness and luxury? The average age of the grammar school graduate today is sixteen years, and he goes through his senior course at the high school with less to his credit in the way of plain, elementary learning than his fathers carried away from the grammar school at fourteen. Boys and girls are sent to the high schools today, not because parents are impressed with the advantages of the course, but because they are in despair at the ignorance of their offspring and see no remedy but more school. If the high school course is to be extended to six years and the university course is added to that, the majority of the graduates from the football field will have reached the age limit before they begin their first tentative efforts towards self-support. Meanwhile, the children at the other end of the scale, the primary pupils, will be housed in sheds and barracks, taught in dark basements, and deprived of play-room, because the greater part of the tax levy for school purposes will be used for maintaining gymnasiums, shower-baths and other modern luxuries in expensive, steam-heated high school buildings where the future champions dawdle over a few books between practice bouts. It is a pretty theory that the longer pupils are kept at books the more they will learn, and that the best brains are to be found amongst the post-graduate students. Professor Munsterberg of Harvard disputes this idea. He says the bright intellects, the able, brilliant men, do not want to waste their time in theorizing when they can be testing theories in practice. They will not spend two or three years of the best part of life getting ready for what they are already able to take hold of. There is a fictitious value attached to a college diploma which often keeps students on until after graduation, when they know well that so far as any other advantage is concerned they are wasting time. It is not lengthening out of the school course that is needed, but lopping off. Any boy or girl who cannot tackle high school work at fourteen never will be capable of it. The sooner such are sent to work at some business which will in time make them self-supporting, the better for them and for the community. Our school courses are too overloaded with fads now. Get down to essentials, and limit the age at which any one may obtain teaching at public expense to twenty years. Cut off the athletic course entirely, and let us have an end to the spectacle of enfeebled clerks, bookkeepers and small tradesmen working up to the last limit of their strength in order to prolong the period of irresponsibility of their husky sons and muscular daughters, and enable colleges to make records. We need a change of public sentiment which will brand every able-bodied man who has reached his legal majority without having entered some trade, business or profession with a view to self-support, as a drone in the hive and a drain on the resources of the community.

A Chapter on Noses

BY HARRY COWELL

The nose, no doubt because of its prominence, has hitherto been sadly neglected in literature: Cyrano de Bergerac's, which at once looms up in the mind of the cultured reader, is dealt with but superficially by the too renowned Edmond Rostand. Lamb has a chapter on ears, but none on noses—an oversight on the part of Elia for which I would never forgive him were it not for the fact that the fascinating subject is thus left virginal; for other writers are as remiss as he. My duty and pleasure is therefore plain. I do not, however, intend to treat here of noses from the standpoint of physiognomy, and set forth the significance of Roman, Grecian, retrousse, or what not, in the delineation of character; nor is it my purpose to consider them æsthetically, from the point of view of appearance. My concern is with the nose as the organ of the sense of smell—a sense for me full of strange meaning, a subtle sense, through which one may enjoy exquisite pleasure or suffer exquisite pain.

I have, in all modesty be it said, a nose, a middle-intelligencer—if I may so call it in imitation of Elia—of more than ordinary talent. The scent of a grain of musk moves me deeply, and the mystery of a grain of musk that gives and gives and grows no less fascinates me. Here, as it seems to me, is a miracle more wonderful than that of the widow's cruse of oil. No matter how beautiful, a woman without love or a flower without perfume affects me but little. My ear drinks deep of Schubert's melodies, say, and I am drunk; my eye drinks deep of the red of a certain rose, and I am drunk; I am drunk, too, when my nose drinks deep of the odors of favorite flowers—at night, when I see them not.

Each human being has a distinct personal odor, disagreeable or delightful, as the case may be, by means of which he or she can be recognized as by voice or by footstep. I have met very nice people, and yet my nose would have none of them. I could not draw a full breath in their immediate presence. The stench (I might just as well say the malodorous word as think it) was without a doubt physical as well as spiritual; was perhaps altogether physical. After being long subjected to it, I must needs expel all the air in my lungs, take a bath, change my clothes, let the wind blow over me. Disguised by perfumery, this evil personal odor is twice deadly. I have, however, admired many people whom my nose could not tolerate.

On the other hand, I have met those who filled their homes or the places they frequented with a fragrance unspeakably delightful, that invited deep inhalations. In their presence I breathed as one does when facing winds coming sweet from flowerful meadows fresh with rain, or from fields of new-mown hay, or from mountain or sea.

In public places—hotels, theatres, street-cars, and the like—renascent of all sorts and conditions of men, my nose causes me a martyrdom beyond mortal sufferance. Ghosts of personal perfumes haunt houses that have been long inhabited. I have a confessed horror of sleeping in one of them.

It is a matter for just wonder that the modern novelist, ever on the lookout for relatively unexploited features, has not made more use of the nose. Zola's muse had, it is true, olfactory nerves; the great Frenchman was evidently aware of the obvious fact that the sense of smell may, with novel effects, be pressed into the service of art. But seldom or never does the nose occupy in fiction that central position that is in fact its natural right. My advice to the "modern novelist" is: Follow your nose!

The truth that smells can bring the past before us with peculiar vividness, is trite enough. With me the fragrance of lilies of the valley awakens memories that have slept these many years, and but for one beloved perfume would, I believe, have long since passed from sleep to death. It is the scent, not the sight, of that exquisite flower that causes the mind's eye to become clarified so that it sees clearly persons and places dim with the dust of years. You who were true friend to me and my garden of long ago, I remember that I remembered you well when lately the breath of the lily of the valley brought you to mind. Since they last saw you in the flesh, my eyes have watched well nigh a score of poppy seasons come and go, and I have drunk lethean draughts of foreign life,—foreign and strange and all absorbing; yet in that fragrant vision your face was as distinct as though I had left you but yesterday. Your face, did I say? Twenty snows have not left mine unchanged. Now I might pass you in the street and know you not. Alas, my friend, the very memory of you is in the keeping of the flowers. I forget you from lily-of-the-valley time to lily-of-the-valley time. When your flower is out of season, remembrance of you is faint as that of fragrance itself.

The perfume of certain white blossoms, commonly put, I regret to say, to sad-sweet uses, will bring more vividly to mind the funeral of your first-born or of your betrothed than will the sight of a hearse.

Why does not some writer of fiction make full use of these facts?

Every lover knows the touch-thrill of palm on palm, cheek on cheek, lip on lip; and more than one flatters himself or herself that he or she could tell blindfold by the sensation experienced the beloved hand out of ten thousand. I should much like to experiment; for I am, tentatively, of the opinion that here the imagination plays an all-important part; that the effect is very indirect indeed. If a rejected suitor were adroitly substituted for an accepted one just wedded, and all the subject's senses except the intensive side of touch somehow put to sleep, I take it that a detested hand could be made to send ecstatic thrills through the body of the most sensitive of expectant brides. I think there is a greater knowledge in the nose than in the hand—the hand distinguishes by form rather than by feeling.

As for me, I am fully persuaded that I should feel just as forlorn as I should look, were I to become minus a nose.

Watkins Turned Down

Subsequently Governor Budd was urged to appoint Mr. A. A. Watkins to the vacancy, but the latter is the manager of the Montague hardware business, and the Executive refused to beat the devil round the stump. Of course there may be nothing essentially wrong in a public official's private business dealings with the government, but the reason of the interdiction is obvious. Some of our merchants are so conscious of their rectitude that they imagine they can do no wrong. Mr. Montague is probably one of them. I noticed some time ago that a branch of the post office was located in a hardware store in Montgomery avenue, and I regarded it as a coincidence but quite a natural one, interesting only in that it goes to show that Mr. Montague knows his business. Of course, I mean the hardware business.

The Next Big Political Fight

The leading Republican politicians of the State are once more buckling on their armor for the fray. The next big fight will be precipitated when the time arrives for selecting delegates-at-large to the National Convention. Only four men can be sent as delegates-at-large, but there are already about ten men ambitious of the honor. Governor Pardee thinks he is entitled to the distinction by reason of his high official position, and also because he rode in the Roosevelt procession in an open carriage, in broad daylight under a full-blown opera hat. His enemies say that he might appear in the convention in evening dress with his whiskers cut low. Those deadly enemies, ex-Governor Gage and General Rubicon Otis, are among the others that covet the distinction, but everybody agrees that it would be fatal to send both. George A. Knight, the attorney, made such a hit in the last National Convention that he thinks he should be sent as a delegate-at-large, and Mose Gunst claims the honor on the score of his itinerary with Roosevelt. Messrs De Young and Spreckels feel that if party service counts for anything their claims are pre-eminent. So it is quite evident that the scramble is to be a lively one.

School Department Politics

Mrs. Irene Doyle Reeves, the teacher who has been consolidated out of the School Department for the second time, should not feel aggrieved against the members of the Board of Education. When she was consolidated out some years ago she enjoyed a vacation pending her reinstatement by the courts, and she recovered all her back salary. She will in all probability have the same pleasant experience again, and by the time she is reinstated the men who have taken advantage of their little brief authority at the expense of the taxpayers will be pursuing the even tenor of their way in private life. Unfortunately the taxpayers have no redress. If the city could sue the school directors on their bonds for the sums in which it has been mulcted by their action in creating vacancies unlawfully to provide jobs for friends with a pull, those gentlemen would be less inclined to manufacture pretexts for the removal of teachers. Mrs. Reeves is recognized as one of the most capable teachers in the department. She was for several years a teacher in the Girls' High School, and during that period she had among her pupils many girls who now, in womanhood, look back to the days of their youth, and congratulate themselves upon having had the guidance of so capable an instructor, and so excellent a character-builder. Mrs. Reeves became unpopular in the department when she entered a protest against the conduct of a female teacher and a male pedagogue who were said to have been carrying on a flirtation somewhat openly.

Her Past

Mrs. Hattie B. Steele, the courageous teacher, who precipitated the tempest in the School Department over the course in drawing, is a woman with a past, not a Pinero past, but one that is not without interest. She was Miss McKee before her marriage with Dr. Charles H. Steele, a distinguished physician and lecturer. She was an orphan, and not of age, and her fiance obtained letters of guardianship over her before marrying her, his purpose being to secure for her the estate left by her father which was withheld by her stepmother, who had taken unto herself a second husband. Her marriage with Dr. Steele, who was many years her senior, proved unhappy and they were divorced. Dr. Steele owned a splendid collection of lantern slides which he used to illustrate his lectures. The slides came into the possession of Mrs. Steele, and after the divorce she took to the lecture platform and made her living by lecturing until she became a teacher in the School Department. She is an entertaining speaker, possessing a well developed sense of humor and considerable magnetism and dramatic ability. As I said last week, she is said to be engaged to W. W. Stone of the James Lick school, who has espoused Mrs. Steele's cause in the present controversy.

Engaged to a Count

Miss Stephens, the charming daughter of Mrs. Anna Cox Stephens, who was out here visiting her mother a short time ago, is now visiting friends in the East. Miss Stephens is engaged, conditionally I hear, to Count William de Jenison Topham Walmuth, a lineal descendant of Charles II of England. The Count is, however, a naturalized citizen of our country and his engagement with Miss Stephens was, I understand, the outcome of a romantic attachment of the love-at-first-sight order. He is at present visiting his aunt, Princess Libenstein of Germany. His grandfather was Grand Chamberlain to the King of Wurtemberg and his father, a favorite of the Court, brought letters to Lafayette when he came to this country. Miss Stephens is a traveled young woman and quite fitted to adorn the highest of social niches. Her mother is one of the most learned scholars among feminine American writers.

Tactless Mr. Symmes

In addition to being president of the Merchants' Association Mr. Frank J. Symmes is also one of the principal stockholders of the Spring Valley Water Company, and in view of his connection with a public utility corporation many people were astonished at the communication sent by the association of which he is president to the Supervisors, urging that no franchise be granted to the Geary Street Railway Company except upon condition that the road be operated by an underground conduit system. Mr. Symmes has not long been interested in the management of the water company, and to his inexperience may be attributed his attempted interference with the business of the railroad. Men of tact engaged in conducting public utilities have always deemed it expedient to stand together. It has never been deemed advisable for the magnates of one corporation to stir public prejudices against another. To do so is considered not only indiscreet but indelicate. But Mr. Symmes is not noted for either his discretion or his tact. His social prestige has given him considerable pull in financial circles of late, but he has not yet achieved anything of note. Moreover, he is not likely to if he continues to make a practice of interfering in other people's business. If there is one company in town that should attend strictly to its own business it is the one in which Mr. Symmes represents a big block of Boston stock.

The Princess Played Queen

Princess Kawananakoa is now the acknowledged leader of the Honolulu smart set. She was formerly Miss Abby Campbell and she has many friends in this city. She is a handsome young woman, and as a promoter of social gayty, she is a distinct success. She was Queen of the Masque at a ball given at the new hotel in Honolulu a few weeks ago, and she presented a stunning picture in her court robes and glittering jewels. Her costume was of ivory silk, a la Princesse, with a train of ruffled chiffon. The corsage and train were ornamented with yellow flowers and applique lace. Over this was worn a heavy ivory silk court train lined with heavy satin. Under the coiffure was worn a magnificent tiara of diamonds, and clasped on her throat was a necklace of diamonds and emeralds. The officers composing the U. S. Army board to select fort sites on Oahu occupied a special box at the ball, which was one of the most ambitious social functions held in Honolulu since the islands were annexed.

Tay-Henshaw Engagement

Formal announcement of the engagement of Mrs. Helen Walker Tay and Supreme Court Justice Frederick W. Henshaw will be announced this afternoon, at a tea to be given at the residence of Mrs. Bert Morrow. Mrs. Tay is one of the beauties of society. It is customary nowadays to refer to every woman in society as a beauty, and consequently the word "beautiful" has lost its significance so far as its application to representatives of the elite is concerned, but Mrs. Tay's physical charms are not of the commonplace variety. She has the pulchritude that commands admiration. Moreover she is a woman of culture and wit, and in the qualities of her mind matches well her fiance who is distinguished in his profession not only for his knowledge of the law, but also for the literary ability which is displayed in his opinions. It is conceded by the bar of the State that the opinions of Justice Henshaw are unsurpassed by those of any other member of the Court, in clearness and purity of diction. The distinguished jurist is also a noted raconteur, and is therefore one of the most interesting of companions.

The Army Scandal

Whenever a scandal breaks out in the army it excites amazement among people who labor under the delusion that the morals of the military gents, and of their feminine relatives, are of a much higher grade than those of civilians. The fact is that they are no better than those of people who have had equal educational and religious training. The army has certain ideals which it cherishes, and it is popularly supposed to be jealous of its honor. The ethics of the military profession are a check upon dishonorable proclivities, and the discipline enforced is conducive to exemplary personal conduct, but the officers of the army are beset by as many temptations as those in private life. Domestic infelicity is not rare in the army, but the scandals of the service are seldom publicly ventilated. Army officers are enjoined from talking for publication, and consequently the scandals of a military post are infrequently given publicity. The case of Lieutenant Hector A. Robichon is an exceptional one. Every one connected with it has been talking. Mrs. Edith Partello Madden, wife of Captain John F. Madden, had too much confidence in the ethics of the military profession, and hence the disgraceful sequel to her flirtations. She is the victim of army gossip, a vice that has grown enormously in the military service since the close of the Spanish war. When the army lost its exclusiveness by reason of the admission of influential volunteers with political pull, it became extremely hazardous for women to flirt promiscuously. Mrs. Madden's flirtations may have been harmless, but she invited suspicion, and when a woman ceases to be above suspicion in the army she is lost.

Her Other Flirtation

Revenge is said to be the motive that inspired the charges against Lieutenant Robichon, but it looks very much as though the friends of the accused officer hope to intimidate the prosecution by threats against officers higher in rank than the defendant. There has been a story in circulation for some time to the effect that Mrs. Madden carried on a flirtation for awhile at the Benicia Barracks with a certain captain whose wife is now threatening him with a suit for divorce in which she will name Captain Madden's wife as co-respondent. All of which is tending to more seriously impair the army's reputation for honor. It appears that there are moral cowards in the army who are willing to sacrifice a woman to save themselves. The plight of Mrs. Madden is indeed pitiful.

An Unwise Appointment

The confirmation, last Monday, of the appointment of Sanford Dole to the position of District Judge of Hawaii, no doubt occasioned much surprise in the islands. There was organized opposition to the appointment of Dole but it appears to have miscarried. It is hard to believe, in view of his appointment, that the President is well informed as to social and political conditions in the islands. If he is well informed on the subject then he has a meagre appreciation of the temperament required for high judicial duty. Honolulu is a hot-bed of social and political strife. Sanford B. Dole is a factional leader. He has engaged in some very bitter political quarrels and he is wedded to the traditions of the missionary set which controls the wealth of the islands, and seeks to regulate the manners and habits of the people. He may be a man of integrity, but he is only human and it is not likely that he will bring to the determination of questions involving either life or property a calm, impartial judgment, free from the prejudices that he has imbibed during a long period of social and political commotion. The people who object to him as a judge espoused the cause of no man. They merely asked that President Roosevelt do as President McKinley did—select a non-resident, some disinterested individual who could deal impartially with the missionary, the anti-missionary, the native and the foreigner.

Beat the Record for Teas

Last Saturday was a trying day for San Francisco. Nothing on the same scale has been known since the Boston Tea-Party, and that occurred a century and a quarter ago. There were seven teas in San Francisco that day. Four of them were very swell ones, and it was the proper thing to "do" them all—all the swell ones. Never was there such a chance for competition among tea-givers and tea-brewers, and it was the consensus of opinion that Mrs. Chesebrough gave THE tea of the season. It was certainly the jolliest and most successful tea that has been given in San Francisco for many a day. There are teas and teas, some are deadly and formal, others are gay and jovial, and the Chesebrough was of the latter sort. It was not even necessary for the hostess to furnish music to enliven her guests—they did that for themselves. Mrs. Chesebrough is cordiality itself and there's nothing of the average cold-blooded society woman about her. She seemed really glad to see people and everyone took the cue from her. Mr. Chesebrough was everywhere, inviting the men to have something that was not in the dining-room and the number of men who thronged the house was a compliment to Chesebrough hospitality. Fully a third of the guests were men—men of importance and standing, not beardless youths. Perhaps something of the success of the tea was due to the attractive matrons who helped to receive and the delicious dainties, so different from the ordinary cut and dried salad and oysters of the ordinary tea, which were served in the dining-room. Whatever it was, Mrs. Chesebrough is being congratulated.

He Was So Attentive

An amusing story is being told of a young and wealthy San Francisco widow who was recently the pleased recipient of the devoted attentions of a young and rather impecunious youth. He was so attractive and the lady had so much money, that his financial distress was lost sight of in the interest he inspired. But this interest was not sufficient and when the time came to accept or reject him the wealthy widow gave him his conge. The youth was much crestfallen for he had counted on winning the lady. Indeed he had counted on it so confidently that for many months he had sent her flowers every day—beautiful flowers, expensive flowers, out-of-season flowers. The widow had often thought that he was going to great expense in her behalf, and he was. After he had been rejected the florist bill was sent to the lady, by order of the youth. She paid it without a murmur—even with a smile. To her friends she said that she did not mind paying the bill at all. What she appreciated was the pleasing attention. The florist smiled too—for his had been a contingent fee.

An Alameda Wedding

A bride in gray, and her maid-of-honor in white, were an innovation at an Alameda wedding last week. It was a home wedding, Miss Salome Waltz being united to Mr. William Whitlow of Washington, D. C. The bride's gown was gray crepe de chine over red silk, which was very becoming to her rich style of beauty. Her sister Mora attended her, her gown being white silk. They are daughters of the W. H. Waltzes of Van Buren avenue. Rev. Dr. Guthrie of Christ church performed the ceremony. The marriage would have been a church affair but owing to a recent death in the family, it was celebrated quietly, only relatives and very intimate friends being present.

Why Ames Was Uncomfortable

Worthington Ames was caused no little annoyance the other day by the announcement, in a morning paper, that one W. Ames had become involved in a lawsuit over some bucket shop transactions, and was seeking to recover monies lost by some alleged crooked dealings. That a member of the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange should be so associated with such an affair was of course impossible, and Worthington Ames was not slow in vigorously explaining that it was quite a different "W. Ames" who was mixed up in the odorous affair. For some hours, though, he was very uncomfortable.

Their Novel Wedding Tour

"Roughing it" honeymoons are taking the place of the old regulation trip to a smart out-of-town hotel, or to Europe. The Ferdinand Stephensons took theirs in the former way. They went to the Grand Canyon of Colorado, and "did" its sights in an unconventional way in outing attire. They are back in town again at their home, which is a most artistic place, furnished in Old English style. Both the Stephensons are ardent collectors of furniture.

Lingerie from Paris

Even Therese Morgan, when she married Norris Davis, did not receive so many presents as did her friend Genevieve Carolan, when she became Mrs. Harry Poett. One exquisite and priceless gift was a wonderful set of handmade lingerie trimmed with real lace and hand-embroidered, that fragile sort that a breath would blow away. It was bought in Paris. Mrs. Frank Carolan's sunburst was a beautiful gift, and Mr. Poett gave his bride some handsome diamonds.

Is Going Abroad

Mrs. Scott, widow of the late Irving M. Scott, has been at death's door with an attack of pneumonia. Though slowly convalescing, she is still in a precarious condition. As soon as she is well enough to travel she will go to Southern California, and thence will proceed by slow stages to New York and Europe. The Scott home will be closed, and everything is now being packed and stored. The art treasures are among the most valuable owned by connoisseurs here, Mr. Scott having been a very liberal patron of artists. Mrs. Scott is not so worldly as her sister-in-law, Mrs. Henry T. Scott, her tastes running rather to mental pleasures than to society.

Bob Burdette's Latest

Robert J. Burdette, the clerical humorist, who has been lecturing in the East while his wife has been addressing women's clubs, wrote to a friend in Pasadena, the other day, and a correspondent sends me the following excerpt from his letter: "I have been on the zig-zag as usual and am very homesick. Mrs. Burdette has eloped with a crowd of club women and I have not seen her for ten days. The elections pleased me mightily, even the result in New York did not at all surprise me. The only surprising thing about New York is that it has moral strength of purpose to be half-way decent two years in twenty. That is a miracle of grace. That proportion will take any New Yorker to heaven. Peter will say to him in kindly rebuke: 'It was all right for you to try to get here, but you had no need to kill yourself doing it.' Shortly after which Peter will miss his keys, watch, lamp and halo. And they will find the New York man hunting a pawn shop."

The New Yellow Journal

After toying with the Los Angeles newspaper field for several years, says my correspondent, and after prolonged investigations, William Randolph Hearst has flung his banners to the semi-tropic breezes of the Southland and announces that he will fill the newspaper field chock full of holes on Sunday, December thirteenth, with an edition that will embrace sixty-four pages and will reach fifty thousand subscribers. The Los Angeles Examiner will espouse simon pure Democracy of the Hearst brand, and incidentally create presidential sentiment of the Hearst variety. An irreverent fellow in Los Angeles says it ought to be called the Hearst Bee Gum as Willie is only setting up stands in the national apiary to catch Democratic honey. The new Examiner will make its appearance through a star trap, and it will come screeching into the world of journalism. On the night of December twelfth there will be a mammoth procession of labor unions in Los Angeles, and banners will be borne bearing the announcement that the Labor Savior has come to free the masses from the galling yoke of capital. The people of Los Angeles are on the tiptoe of expectancy. They are looking forward to a battle royal between Hearst and Harison Gray Otis of the Times. The Rubicon hero is already manifesting signs of alarm. He has summoned the members of his staff into his sanctum and has entreated them to stand fast, at the same time adding a little pleasing persuasion through the medium of an increased salary roll.

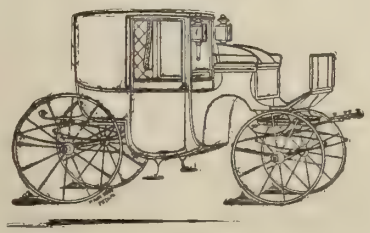
To Whom Credit Is Due

The average newspaper proprietor is seized with a fit of generosity when his field is entered by William R. Hearst. I have never sounded the depths of Mr. Hearst's sympathy for the plain people, but I know of the benefits that have accrued to the plain working newspaper man by reason of the pace set by the greatest of all exponents of yellow journalism, and I shall always welcome an opportunity to sound his praises in that connection. Hearst has always been the advance agent of prosperity in the newspaper business. He is entitled to the gratitude of the whole newspaper fraternity, including the men who have been given an increase of salary by Harrison Gray Otis, and if Mr. Hearst wants any of them it is not likely that they will hesitate to leave the Times.

To Smash Otis

One of the stories afloat in Los Angeles anent the coming of the new yellow journal is that Mr. Hearst is partly inspired by a desire to wreak revenge on General Otis, on account of the attacks made many years ago on Senator George Hearst. The newspaper men of Los Angeles are jubilant over the coming of Hearst, and it is said that ninety per cent of them are eager for a call to the Examiner office. The first to join the new staff is Ferdinand Webb of the Herald. He is to be the news editor of the new paper. It is reported that after the paper has been fairly launched Charley Nicholson, formerly of this city, but now one of the stars of New York journalism, will come out to take charge of it.

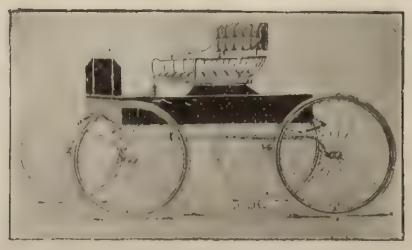
His Ambition



The very latest report concerning the political aspirations of Mr. Hearst is that he is not seriously seeking the nomination for President by the next Democratic National Convention; that he is merely shaping his political fortunes for 1908. It is said that he will make a show of strength in the convention, but not with the hope of securing the nomination, because he will not be ready to launch a real, substantial presidential boom. Hearst's newspaper enterprises have not yet begun to attain the importance which he has in view for them. And yet his influence is today far more widespread than even well-informed people imagine. It is not confined to the newspapers under his direct control. It extends to many papers scattered throughout the country that are indebted to him for their news service. That news service grows with each new Hearst paper that is established. It is rapidly becoming a rival of the Associated Press. If the rate of progress it has made in the past four years is maintained in the next four, William R. Hearst will indeed be the Napoleon of Journalism.

Edgren and Davenport

Bob Edgren, of the Hearst staff of artists, came to town the other day and he brought some interesting news from newspaper circles in the East. Since Homer Davenport began illustrating Brisbane's freak editorials on temperance his admirers have not had much opportunity to enthuse over him. Edgren is now exploiting the field in which Davenport made his reputation, and with great success. Some people think that as Davenport's work nowadays shows signs of brain-fag, the consequence of trying to absorb the Brisbane temperament, he has lost his grip as a cartoonist, but Edgren says that his brother artist has lost none of his vim and that when he returns to more congenial work he prove that he is in his old form. According to Edgren, Davenport is still an ardent animal lover, and a few weeks ago he confided in a friend that his ambition was to own an elephant and a tiger. He has quite a menagerie on his New Jersey farm, and he has the most valuable collection of pheasants in the world.



Davenport's Luck

Edgren tells an amusing story by way of illustration of Davenport's phenomenal luck. Seven months ago, a woman about eighty years of age, who owned a farm in New Jersey adjoining Davenport's, submitted a proposition to the artist. She said that she would deed to him her farm, which was worth about ten thousand dollars, providing he would agree to give her one thousand dollars a year for the remainder of her life. Davenport considered the proposition for a few days, and then rejected it. The woman looked so rugged that he thought it quite probable that she would pass the century mark. So he didn't want to take a gambler's chance. However, he said that he would agree to give her one thousand a year in semi-annual payments, for ten years, but no longer. She accepted his proposition, received the first payment a little over a month ago, and a week later she died leaving Davenport in possession of the farm. Davenport, by the way, has temporarily severed his connection with the Hearst papers to go on the lecture platform. He has a repertoire of stories that would make a hit on the vaudeville circuit.

The Eccentric Swinnerton

Edgren tells an amusing story of his other Californian confrere, Jimmy Swinnerton, the discoverer of the miniature Californian bear. For awhile after his advent to the metropolis, Jimmy of the garish sweater and the variegated shirt-waist undertook to set the pace in the tenderloin. He made things hum along Broadway in his breezy, Western way, and was soon better known on the Rialto than either Dan Daly or William Faversham. In time he divorced himself from his art to train with the devotees of Bacchus, and promote the gayety of the post-theatre cafes. But Jimmy has pulled himself together again and is now one of the most prolific contributors to the comic supp. The red-light district has not lost its fascinations, however, and Jimmy is still popular among its denizens. It is said that he would rather be a prize-fighter than the highest salaried artist in America. One night, some months ago, he entered a saloon on the docks to get a bracer, and attracted the attention of two sailors. They whispered to the bar-keeper and presently the latter approached the artist and said, "Those sailors want to know who you are."

"Tell 'em I'm Terry McGovern," said Swinnerton.

A few moments later one of the sailors swaggered over to Swinnerton.

"Say," he began, "I've always wanted to know how it feels to lick a prize-fighter."

And by way of realizing the long cherished desire he hit Swinnerton in the eye and put him out. The artist made his appearance at the Journal office next day with a badly discolored face.

Gibson's Big Contract

Various are the reports that have been circulated concerning the big contract entered into some time ago, between Collier's and artist Gibson, of Gibson-girl fame, whose drawings appeared for many years exclusively in Life. According to one report Collier's had secured the services of Gibson for twenty thousand a year, but the fact is, says Bob Edgren, that the publishers of the weekly have contracted to pay the artist one thousand dollars apiece for his drawings, and that he is required to supply them with fifty-four within two years. This contract was made by one of the junior members of the publishing firm, and it spread cold chills over the other members when they heard about it. They thought it was a bad bargain, but the advertising that resulted from it has vindicated the business judgment of the junior member.

Mrs. A. B. Hammond gave a dinner last week at which twenty-eight covers were laid.

Two seasons ago there was a deal of grumbling among the members of the smart dancing clubs because only weak punch was served at the suppers. There was a demand for something exhilarating; something that would stimulate small talk, and promote congeniality. And now there will be joy among those who attend the functions of La Jeunesse, the most exclusive of the revived dancing clubs, for it has been decided to use Ayala, the most popular of champagnes, at all the functions of that organization.

His Several Marriages

It is not always the man of Sandow physique and Apollo Belvedere pulchritude who wins the most admiration from the fair sex. Robert L. Sherwood, who died this week, was not especially good-looking but he was married three times, and every wedding was a love-match. When "Bert" Sherwood was a lad, at dancing-school he always had his choice of partners, and when he grew up and went into society it was the same way. Women always loved him. His first wife was Mamie Blethen. They had a big, smart wedding in church with the full accompaniment of bridesmaids and splendor. After a few years came a divorce. Though a charming lover, young Sherwood had not proved an ideal husband. It was not very long after this that Bert Sherwood found a second bride in Hope Ellis, the beautiful society tennis champion from up country. This marriage was also followed by a divorce. The first Mrs. Sherwood is still that. Though twice reported engaged, once to young Harry Macfarlane and again to a Mr. Kaufmann, Mrs. Mary Blethen Sherwood has not changed her name. The second Mrs. Sherwood, however, has married twice since her divorce from her first husband.

His Aunt's Romance

Young George Whittell is not the only one of old Nicholas Luning's descendants to permit romance to enter into his matrimonial arrangements. His aunt, Mrs. George S. Fife, contracted a romantic marriage, though no one would fancy such a thing now, such a conventional matron she has become. The Fife marriage was an elopement. The bridegroom occupied an humble position in the navy. It was a love match, but Papa Luning didn't approve of it. They said he nearly died when the news was brought to him of the hasty marriage, which took place in San Jose. Wags of the clubs suggested his illness was caused by his doubt as to whether the bridegroom had sufficient to pay the minister's fee. The Fifes have become very liberal spenders since old Nick's death. It is a curious thing that all the old miser's children are lavish in expenditure, not one having followed in his footprints. Mrs. Fife, by the way, though brought up a Catholic, has made Episcopalians of her daughters. She is a conservative woman and dislikes anything like newspaper notice. When her daughter Beatrice was to take part in an amateur theatrical affair last winter, Mrs. Fife insisted on having her name omitted from the program. She was very irate when Beatrice's picture appeared in the papers.

She Has Twenty-five Hats

The bride of a fortnight ago, Mrs. Andrew P. Welch, will probably be the smartest gowned matron in society this winter. After Julia de Lavcaga left the convent where she was educated, her mind still turned to religion and her friends were afraid she would elect to become a nun, but she soon found the world a pleasant place. With her beauty, style and great wealth, she is well-fitted to be a social leader. Her trousseau, by the way, is one of the most complete and beautiful ever possessed by a San Francisco bride. It includes twenty-five hats.

Developments Awaited

Vesta Shortridge, whose engagement with Emile Bruguiere, one of the eccentric Bruguieres, was reported to have been broken off some time ago, has gone East. Young Bruguiere is also in the East, and consequently the friends of both the young people are now on the qui vive for news of developments. Some of those friends say they wouldn't be surprised if the engagement were renewed, for they believe that the breaking of it was the result of a trivial misunderstanding.

Lady Sybil Cutting, who arrived with her husband, Bayard Cutting, at the Palace last week, on the way to their beet sugar place in the South, is a bas bleu. She is said to have under way a novel dealing with American life.

They'll Keep in the Whirl

It is not thought that the death of Mrs. Santa Marina will send into social retirement her nieces, the Mesdames Augustus and Will Taylor and Fred McNear, this winter. The Hopkins sisters were very fond of their aunt, but they have the courage to break away from the conventions that obtain among relatives of the departed. Their grandmother died a few seasons ago, and shortly after Mrs. Gus Taylor appeared at the opera. Mourning, by the way, is going out of fashion, though extremists still affect the dark band on a white overcoat, because it is so chic and English. Some people love to be ostentatious even in their sadness. They do queer things in society. A bud whose mother was in mourning made her debut at a formal home function the other day, but Mamma did not preside. She directed affairs from behind the scenes, and the girls' aunt did the honors.

Why He's Suspected

The appointment of Attorney Brobeck to the position of Chief Assistant in the office of the City Attorney-elect, Percy V. Long, has given rise to some ugly gossip in political circles. Brobeck is a brother-in-law of Boss McNab, and since the announcement of his appointment by Long, some of the politicians have recalled the fact that Gavin appeared very reluctant, some time ago, to jeopardize the chances of the Republican candidate. When the Democratic convention was in session McNab wouldn't agree to nominate anybody for City Attorney who would be likely to defeat Long. He objected to several and agreed only to those who, he knew, would not accept the nomination. He was afterwards urged to endorse the Democrat nominated by the Labor Party, and though the Democratic party could have won the office by so doing, McNab would not consent. It was suspected during the campaign that McNab was interested in the election of Long, and the suspicious ones now view the appointment of his brother-in-law as significant. Those who know that Mr. Brobeck is an exceptionally able lawyer, familiar with the litigation in which the city is involved, and with the duties of the office, and that Long lacks not only experience but also a sound knowledge of law, regard the suspicions of the skeptical as groundless. Those who know that treachery is characteristic of McNab's nature are quick to attribute vicious motives to all his political acts. It will be remembered that, some years ago, when he was on the junta that reorganized the Democratic party, he participated in the nomination of a candidate for high office and supported his opponent.

An Episode of the War

York Noel, who paid us a fleeting visit last week while on his way to the Asiatic station, was a leading figure in a dramatic scene on board the Marblehead when he was the navigator and McCalla the captain of that vessel in Guantanamo bay during the Spanish war. It was on the night of the sortie from the marine camp on shore, during which a Spanish lieutenant had been captured and was taken on board the Marblehead for safe keeping. The Spaniard was shown every courtesy by the American officers, but it was soon noticed by the little group in the ward-room that he was in a towering rage, and getting madder every minute, while a conversation was going on in Spanish between two Cuban officers who were present as allies and guests. Noel came in just then, and being the only American who understood Spanish, quickly saw that the Cubans were hurling insults at the unfortunate prisoner. Noel turned upon the offenders sharply. "Look here," he said to them bluntly, "that officer is a gentleman and a prisoner of war. He is to be treated as such. If a single insult is uttered against him, the Captain will put the offender on the beach right off—and I don't give a damn who he is." That quieted the Cubans. The Spanish lieutenant spent the rest of the evening enjoying the hospitality that the American officers extended him in his captivity.

A letter from Japan informs me of a misfortune that befell Midshipman Nichols, of the gunboat Annapolis. Young Nichols, who is quite an athlete, took part in a game of football at Kobe between the team from his vessel and a picked team, and he was heavily thrown in a scrimmage, his leg being broken by his fall. He was carried off to the Annapolis, where he was treated for the mishap suffered in the cause of carrying our national games to foreign lands.

The Booming of Persham

From Army officers returning from the Philippines I am repeatedly hearing stories that lead me to the conclusion that the much extolled Captain J. J. Pershing is another man to be added to the list of Schleys, Miles's, and other military false alarms. It is evident that Pershing owes more to his pull and to newspaper notoriety than to his merit, even though that be above the average. The methods by which he has achieved fame are not dissimilar from those employed by both Schley and Miles, who are the most conspicuous examples of men who have fooled both the press and the public into thinking them the heroes of the age. In the first place, it was an undeserved rebuke to other officers to place Pershing, a captain, in charge of an expedition such as the Mindanao campaign, over the heads of entirely competent, but modest, pull-lacking, seniors. It is true that Pershing's column did good work, but the news that comes to me now, from men both senior and junior to him, sheds light upon the degree to which its success was due to Pershing himself. Time and again, I am told, a detachment of his command would sally forth, defeat and scatter the enemy, and then Pershing would follow with another force, meet little if any opposition, and later make a glowing report of the whole operation, the real work of which was performed by the first detachment. It saddens me to contemplate a fallen idol, but I am driven to the necessity of regarding Pershing as another press-agent hero.

When Stone Wooed Miss Conde

The conviction, by court-martial, of Lieutenant G. L. P. Stone, U. S. Navy, of the charge of drunkenness on duty, calls to mind another occasion when that young officer found himself before a military tribunal, but for a quite different reason. Six years ago Stone, then an Ensign, attracted much attention to himself by his devotion to Miss Marie Conde, the daughter of Swits Conde, a wealthy New York merchant. While the young swain found much favor in the girl's eyes, he failed to impress her father, and plans were laid, it was alleged, for an elopement. In his rage, the stern parent preferred charges of "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman" against Stone, and the principals were soon participating in a formal proceeding before a court of inquiry. Much of the spectacular attended the court's doings, but Stone emerged with flying colors, the court holding that he had done nothing either ungentlemanly or unofficerlike in endeavoring to woo the maid of his choice, even if he threatened the Lochinvar tactics. The Secretary of the Navy approved the court's findings, and the incident ended with Miss Conde's departure for some distant place and Stone's assignment to other duty. Drunkenness is much rarer among officers of the Navy now than it was in past years, the complication and value of the properties nowadays under their charge being so greatly increased that risking damage by reason of muddled brains is more than ever reprehensible. tence of a mere loss of numbers in his grade is so lenient that it can only be accounted for by his past good record and the great dearth of officers in the Navy.

Captain Kelly's Auxiliary

Out at the Page and Gough street armory that gallant National Guardsman, Captain Kelly, is drilling a class of young women in military tactics. It is an Auxiliary to the N. G. C., and the feminine soldiers are to be taught how to march like real guardsmen, how to fence and various other things. When Captain Kelly was asked the other day what the purpose of the Auxiliary was, he answered:

"I guess it's a matrimonial bureau."

A Plea for the Hazer

As a result of the dismissal of Midshipmen Lofland, Chafee and Little for hazing, at a time when the Navy is in great straits for officers, many thoughtful people are questioning the wisdom of the law that provides so drastic a punishment for what is a mere boyish prank, by no means as terrible as the doting parents of a few milksop mammas' darlings believe. The case is well indicated by the following letter which has been received by President Roosevelt:

New York, Nov. 1, 1903.

To the President,

Dear Sir: I trust you will modify to a leave of absence, say for three months with pay, Secretary Moody's drastic sentence of dismissal forever from the Navy of three midshipmen for alleged hazing. In the name of Heaven, is the punishment of hazing to be equal to that of treason in time of war—to that of Hale's "Man without a Country"? Freshmen as a rule ought to be hazed, same as I was and some others who would never have amounted to anything otherwise. I am, Faithfully yours, W. H. Ballou.

There is much sense in what Mr. Ballou says. For thirty years, the law imposing dismissal as the sentence for hazing has been in force but it has not abolished hazing and never will. Instead, it has deprived the service of many good officers. There are not a thousand people in the country who know what Naval Academy hazing really is. Standing on one's head, singing the laundry-list to the tune of "Mary Had a Little Lamb," growling like a bear, performing a selected number of the regular "setting up" exercise, saying "Sir" to seniors, running upstairs on all-fours, "furling the wardrobe," and other silly products of youthful imaginations, are surely not great hardships, and these are specimens of the "brutal hazing." A youth who cannot endure them has no business in a military calling.

She Sings Folk Songs

Miss Ramus, sister of Dr. Ramus of the U. S. Marine Hospital, will play the violin at Miss Ingeborg Resch-Petersen's song recital next Saturday afternoon. Miss Ramus is a very clever violinist, and is out here on a visit to her brother. Miss Resch-Petersen is a Swedish artist of reputation who has sung with Gade, Grieg, Sinding, Richter and others of the noted conductors of Europe. She will render some of the charming folk songs of Scandinavia, among other things. Will Greenbaum has charge of the affair, which is to be given in Lyric hall and is invitational.

Paymaster Eugene D. Ryan, U. S. N., is the proud father of the first American baby to be born on the island of Guam. Baby Ryan is now two months old. Her father was one of the heroes of the battle of Manila Bay, having served on the Concord.

Gossip of the Army

More changes have occurred at army headquarters. A new chief surgeon has made his appearance in the Phelan building, in the person of Lieutenant-Colonel George H. Torney. He succeeded Colonel H. S. Kilbourne who will leave for Manila on Tuesday. Captain George W. Rethers is to be the new chief commissary, and Major Krauthoff the purchasing commissary. Colonel L. W. Maus has been ordered to Fort Riley, and he will be succeeded in the Medical Supply Depot by Major Louis Brechemin. The latter was stationed at the Presidio some years ago, and at that time his wife was the soprano of Grace Episcopal church choir.

There were army brides galore on the Sheridan when that transport left for Manila with the Twenty-second Infantry, but the record of that regiment will be beaten when the Twentieth sails on next Tuesday. Eight out of the eleven lieutenants of the regiment will be accompanied by their brides.

Among the Artists

Local art lovers are finding much to interest them these days. Lorenzo P. Latimer's pupils held an exhibition in Maple hall last week, and the annual winter exhibition is on at the Hopkins Institute. The Bohemian Club artists will hold theirs within a fortnight. The Latimer exhibition contained some clever pupil work. One of the students whose work shows more than mere promise is Alice V. Myers, who exhibited fourteen sketches, chiefly Santa Cruz and Mill Valley scenes. There's a deal of atmosphere in F. Sewall Brown's work. His sketches were not pretentious but bits of nature well treated. M. W. Buck, J. E. Wilson, Amanda Austin, O. H. Hansen and Norma L. Castle had some good things in the showing of pupils' work. Miss Castle is one of the society amateurs, but she has evidently not permitted the magnetic giddy whirl to lure her from serious work. Her Killarney sketches are charming. F. Edith Whitefield has studied so long with Mr. Latimer that she has caught all his tricks of style and it is rather hard to distinguish between Miss Whitefield's work and that of her master. Still she shows plenty of originality in her treatment of Chinatown scenes. A "Land's End" and "Path—Mill Valley" were especially good. Mr. Latimer had a "Land's End," also, in the exhibition, a strong treatment of a place familiar to us all. A sketch of the Mill Valley redwoods was also delightful.

At the Hopkins

Piazzoni, who has one of his most exquisite things in the Hopkins hanging this year, is the artist who was the means of forming the California Society of Artists, the secessionists from the Mathews cult. Some of the Hopkins' committee objected to Piazzoni's work once upon a time, but it has a conspicuous position on the walls this year. "The Pool" is a delicious bit, full of poetry. Willis Davis, president of the Art Association, who is a business man when he isn't an artist, has some beautiful sketches. Gamble, Latimer, Olga Ackerman, Alice Chittenden, Haig Patigian and C. A. Friis show some admirable works. The miniatures are a striking feature of this year's exhibition. Last year the tiny gems were rather thrust into the background, but Rose Hooper Platner, Hallie Erminie Hyde, Lilla V. O'Ryan, Rose Campbell, Mrs. Arthur Silverberg and others are well represented this season.

Miss Clement Returns

Miss Ethel Clement, the young San Francisco artist who never made much of a furor here, but whose work has met with considerable success in the East, is again in San Francisco, which is really her home. Miss Clement and her mother have been spending some years in Boston, where they were the guests of their cousin, Mrs. Beach, the musician. Miss Clement had a studio in Boston and many of her pictures now hang in the best Beacon Hill homes.

They Almost Met

There have been rumors for some time of an engagement between Francis McComas, the artist, and a young woman who paints well, and is handsome and somewhat his senior. But since his return from Monterey it has been reported that he has another affair on his hands. His Monterey inamorata came to town the other day, and she came within an ace of meeting the woman who paints face to face in Vickery's, where McComas was engaged in hanging his pictures. McComas was quite startled at the prospect of figuring in an embarrassing situation. By the way, his friends are delighted with the fine display of pictures he has made at Vickery's. This young man has made remarkable progress in his art. He has been working hard at Monterey and improvement has been noticed, especially in his drawing, which was his weak point.

Keith's Mammoth Effort

Keith is at work upon the largest picture of his entire career. It is an immense canvas ordered by the Hotel St. Francis Company and the artist dances up and down upon a support in order to paint it. It is said that he laid in almost the entire picture during the first five hours, working like a Trojan. So easy are the broad effects for him that the picture appeared to be finished then. It is a Tamalpais and it almost seems as though the mountain rose before you. The immense canvas is to be the only picture in the marble hall and will be an excellent advertisement for Keith. He is receiving for it the largest price of his career—ten thousand dollars. So furious has been the artist's frenzy that his wife predicted a fit of illness after the picture was painted, but so far the maestro has escaped.

Wheeler Meets Dunne

Many lawyers neglected the interests of their clients last week. They were taking as deep an interest in a case on trial before Judge Kerrigan as does the average small boy in a university football contest. The case possessed none of the elements of interest that make for success in a Pinero problem play, but if it had been held in the Columbia theatre at the regulation price of a top-notch show, and none but lawyers had been privileged to attend, there would not have been any vacant seats. The intensity of the interest was due largely to the fact that Peter F. Dunne and Charles S. Wheeler were opposing counsel. Those two young attorneys are distinguished in their profession, and to follow the trial of a case in which they are engaged is a liberal education. Dunne has a phenomenal string of victories to his credit, and as a consequence he enjoys rare prestige. Ever since he began trying cases for the railroads he has been mowing down opposing counsel with wonderful dexterity. Until he slipped a cog in a case against John J. Barrett and later on against the Johnson brothers, late of Sacramento, he seemed invincible as a jury lawyer. Wheeler is not so distinguished as a jury lawyer as he is in other departments of his profession, but he ranks among the leaders of the bar. So when Wheeler and Dunne appeared in opposition to each other for the first time, the interest aroused in legal circles was akin to that which quickens the blood of an audience at a championship battle between heavy-weight prize fighters.

How a Leg Was Lost

The suit involved the claim of a man named Goldberg against both the Southern Pacific Company and the United Railroads Company for fifty thousand dollars damages for the loss of a leg. He was a passenger one day on an electric car that came into collision with a Southern Pacific train at the Sunnyside crossing. There are gates at that point maintained by the Southern Pacific Company, and a man is employed to lower them to stop traffic whenever a train appears. On this particular day he failed to see the train in time to lower the gates, and the engine crashed into the electric car. The facts were plain. The jury was called upon to determine the question of the negligence of either or both of the companies. Goldberg's attorney, Mr. Friedenrich, sought to saddle the blame on both because if successful the verdict would probably be larger than if only one had to pay the damages. Dunne as the attorney for the Southern Pacific blamed it on the United Railroads, and Wheeler, representing the United Railroads, contended that the responsibility was on the Southern Pacific. For four weeks they hammered away at the evidence, and the manoeuvring of those two wizards of the legal profession was an instructive revelation to a throng of Blackstonian disciples.

A Battle Royal

To the lay observer it would be impossible to discern which of the two had the advantage of inherent merit, but to the legal mind it was plain that Dunne had an uphill battle, devolving on him as it did to prove that the Southern Pacific had exhausted all precautions against accident at that point. His main point was that as the plaintiff was a passenger on a car of the United Railroads, that company was charged with the responsibility of a common carrier; that it was required to observe the highest degree of caution, whereas, the Southern Pacific, having no interest in the plaintiff, was required, under the law, to exercise only ordinary caution. The two lawyers were fairly saturated with technical knowledge pertinent to the operation of both electric and steam railroads. Moreover they had made a study of civil engineering and they spouted mathematics from beginning to the end of the trial in their efforts to elicit information from experts on the speed of a train, the time it took to cover a certain distance, the practicability of various devices for signaling, et cetera. And at the same time they were primed with the law of the case. The argument showed both lawyers at their best, one—Wheeler—in rhetorical flourishes and rounded periods, and the other in the expounding of cold, hard facts, and of the law on which he relied for a verdict. Judge Kerrigan had the last word, or rather words, for he gave a very lucid and learned exposition of the law, and then the jury, after deliberating several hours, decided that Goldberg, who valued his leg at fifty thousand, was entitled to just fourteen thousand two hundred dollars.

She Wept on His Poem

Clarence T. Urmy feels that his Muse has been vindicated. Mr. Urmy is the poet laureate of San Jose. He is also a musician and a social lion, too, and as he is a church organist he has always zealously safeguarded his reputation for morality. It was therefore a great shock to him as well as to strait-laced San Jose, when, a little while ago, he was charged with being a home-wrecker. The charge was made by Eugene T. Russell, an Idaho drummer, in a suit for divorce. Mrs. Russell resided in San Jose before her marriage, and she was one of Urmy's most promising music pupils. The marriage took place two years ago, and then the Russells went to bleak and barren Idaho to live. According to the husband's story all went well until, one day, he found his wife weeping tears into a magazine, moistening one of Urmy's poems. He questioned her as to the cause of her sadness, and she said that she had been reading Urmy's verse, and that as she loved the poet his tender sentiments superinduced melancholy. Shortly after that Mrs. Russell returned to San Jose, and she was followed by her husband who instituted suit for divorce, alleging in his complaint that Urmy was responsible for his troubles. But the other day the court granted Mrs. Russell a divorce on her cross-complaint. So Urmy feels that his Muse still enjoys a stainless reputation.

A Capitalistic Feud

Santa Clara county is the scene of a bitter feud between two rival electric railway corporations, the San Jose and Los Gatos Interurban Company and the San Jose Electric. The former is championed by James W. Rea, the capitalist and politician, who is president of the company, and F. S. Granger, the manager. The Germania Trust Company of this city, represented by George W. Barker, is backing the San Jose Electric company. Both are seeking to control the franchises and rights of way over desirable sections of the county. The people of the Santa Clara Valley have but recently awakened to a realization of the fact that their county affords a splendid field for development. Rea and Granger were the first to stimulate enterprise. After organizing a company they secured franchises and constructed a road to Los Gatos by way of Saratoga. When they wanted a franchise within the city they met their first opposition. Their bid for the franchise was run up by an outsider and it cost them over five thousand dollars. Then they were bothered for awhile by injunction suits. They were very indignant and thought that as they were doing a great deal for the county they should be given everything they wanted for nothing. They attributed the opposition to their enterprise to the Germania Trust Company. They said that the San Jose Railway was jealous of their encroachments and desired to block them in every way possible. Some time ago the San Jose Railway applied for a franchise over Hamilton avenue to Campbell, to which place they contemplated extending their road, and the residents were apparently delighted with the prospect of being connected with San Jose by an electric line. Rea and Granger immediately opposed the granting of the franchise, by way of retaliation, and they succeeded in blocking the selling of the franchise. When the matter came before the Supervisors last Monday the bids were all rejected. But the end is not yet. Rea has not built his road and it is intimated that when he begins he will meet with some stern opposition from property owners.

Sombre Bohemia

The Bohemian Club walls are having a new coat of paint and tinting, and no Bohemian will dream again that he dwelt in marble halls. If he dreams at all he will have a nightmare. The walls are now of ebony, and so overloaded with gilding to overcome the dolorous effect of black paint that they present an atrocious appearance. The rooms now look like the apartments of a fashionable undertaker. No one appears to know who is responsible, but as usual President James D. Phelan is under suspicion. The Bohemians are sadly ungrateful to Mr. Phelan who has done so much for them and for the club. That they appreciate his wealth is evident from the fact that they twice elected him president.

The Passing of the Tivoli

When man, grown rebellious, relinquished the right
To all things reflecting God's spiritual light,
An angel, in pity, reputed the cost,
And music was left us when Eden was lost.

And so, little Tivoli, this is goodbye;
I make it, old friend, 'twixt a laugh and a cry.
I know by the sigh that will not be repressed
Another will never hold sway in my breast
As you have; no structure of new-fangled grace
Can blot from my heart this Bohemian place.
I love your old back-breaking, hard-seated chairs,
Your quaint, little, dark, nestling boxes upstairs,
Where many a man, under stress of the play,
Has said foolish things he regretted next day.
I love your old stage with its fanciful hue
Of settings, no stage but this queer one ere knew
And though your drop-curtain is wonderous, quite,
I haven't the heart of a critic tonight,
So all the defects you so frankly reveal
Are lost in the honest regret that I feel.

The Catskills? Why, yes, I have seen them before,
And old Rip Van Winkle, tired, weary, and sore;
Hush! Hartman is speaking beneath the disguise
In a way that brings unbidden tears to your eyes.
A weird and incongruous, hurrying throng,
Some singing, some tragic, sweeps blindly along;
Old forms and old faces I view from my stall
Long since praised or blamed by the Critic of All.
I hear distant music that stirs in my breast
A whirlwind of passions, then soothes them to rest;
For music can cleanse, like a chastening rod,
And send the starved soul, pleading, back to its God.
The melody wakes a long slumbering sense
That dies, ere 'tis born, from its own impotence.
What's this? Shadow-faces grow dim, and the show
Is not what it was half a minute ago.
The curtain goes down, and the Tivoli's page
'Twixt the farce of the world and the farce of the stage
Is finished and closed. As I draw near the door
And whisper that ominous word, "Nevermore,"
Not woefully pained that I have the excuse
Rememb'ring some operas I've seen you produce—
Forgive me, the thrust was unwittingly dealt;
Impatience I may have at other times felt
Is absent tonight. Old Bohemian place,
I make my adieux with a sorrowful face.
Let's walk down your aisle for the last time, and try
To whisper goodnight, and forget 'tis goodbye.

MABEL PORTER PITTS.

The Stage

Our Historic Opera House

The passing of the old Tivoli inspires such tender and fond recollections, fraught with sentiment and emotion, that it seems a profanity to tear down the historic playhouse and thereby efface a picturesque monument to musical triumphs of the long ago. To the Tivoli many people in this community owe the development of the love of music. It was in the Tivoli that many of us heard opera for the first time, and within its portals we have witnessed the evolution of talent that first won recognition on the old stage and that subsequently scored triumphs in other climes. Some day the history of the Tivoli will be written, and it will be found to be a chronicle of the development of the musical education of this community. It was opened back in the seventies by the Kreling Brothers as a music and concert hall, and for awhile it appealed exclusively to the German colony. In those days there was sawdust on the floor and the auditors sat at round tables with their steins in front of them, and listened to German vocalists. Foreigners were the exclusive patrons of the house. The management did not begin to appeal to the general public until about the year 1879, when a good comic opera company was rounded up, the leading members of which came from a company that had appeared in the Baldwin, and that was stranded on the coast. A tenor with a paunch named Eckert was one of them. Among the others were his wife, Louise Leighton, a soprano, and Ethel Lynton, a dashing soubrette. The first opera that attracted attention was "Satanella" in which Frederick Bornemann, a basso, made a great hit as Mephisto. For years thereafter "Satanella" was the Tivoli's piece de resistance. It was revived every time business threatened to be dull.

Some of the Old Favorites

Some time ago it was suggested that ere the old Tivoli be demolished, a memorial performance be held in the venerable shack. What a pleasure it would be if some of the old-time mummers could be induced to pass in procession before the footlights that had so often illumined their make-up in the days agone! On second thought, how painful such an exhibition would be! Who, for instance, would care to see the once dashing and vivacious Ethel Lynton, the devil-may-care soubrette of other days, the darling of the primitive club-johnnies, amble across the stage, faded, fat and fifty? What a pathetic picture many of the favorites of long ago would present! Who that catches a glimpse of Arthur Messmer in the chorus these days, and recalls the tenor in his prime, though he was never a great artist, can suppress a feeling of sadness? Plump little Hattie Moore of the young Tivoli is now far advanced in the sere and yellow period, and her husband, Harry Gates, who scored in many a tenor role, is now a white-haired old gentleman. Helene Dingeon is another of the old favorites who sang herself into the hearts of Tivoli patrons years ago, and who is now living in this city, where her name is but a memory. Slim Louise Manfred with her high, shrill tones, Harry Norman, who later joined Henderson's forces in Chicago; Max Figman, who was later Sadie Martinot's husband; the clever Valergas—all those names are connected with the Tivoli's prime. Poor Kate Marchi, one of the best all-round vocalists the Tivoli ever had, passed away some years ago. She was of the Valerga family. The wonderfully preserved Emily Soldene, a veteran of the operatic stage, played more than one engagement at the Tivoli, and is still, I believe, in the land of the living. Others whose names I recall are the Gaillards—Alice and Francis, Alice Vincent, Gracie Plaisted, Emelie Melville, and, coming down to more recent times, the plump form of Tillie Salinger looms before my mental vision. It was at the Tivoli that Edwin Stevens first played on the risibles of an audience, and it was there that Alice Nielsen developed from a chorus girl into a prima donna. The Tivoli has had many good and many bad singers, but the prices usually silenced criticism. Some of the favorites were vocalists of mediocre ability, but there was always, in the old house, a sort of "happy family" atmosphere, and crudities and shortcomings were generously overlooked. The veteran theatregoer will tell you, as is his habit, that the old triumphs were the greatest, but they were not. In the period of our musical adolescence we were easily satisfied. The most artistic work was done in a comparatively recent period, but last season and the season before of comic opera, the house suffered somewhat from lack of talent. The future is big with promise. Ferris Hartman has returned with

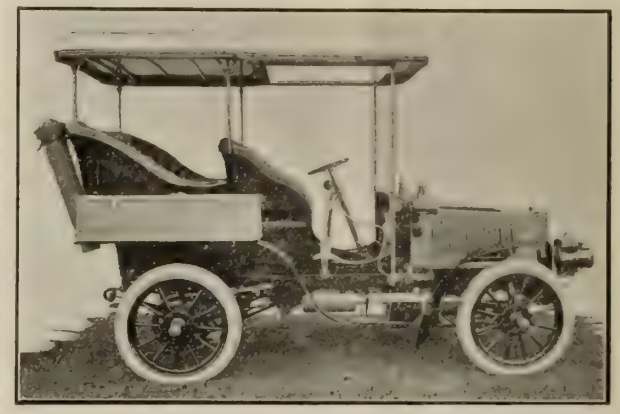
Automobile Topics

The automobile races at Los Angeles were a great success. Barney Oldfield was the hero of the meet, and as a result of his daring racing the world's record for a circular mile now stands at the fifty four and four-fifths seconds mark. On the opening day of the meet the great champion negotiated a mile in fifty-five seconds flat, thus smashing the record made at the Empire City track, but on Sunday in an exhibition he not only reeled off two miles in fifty-four and four-fifths each but also lowered the five mile record to four minutes, forty and one-fifth seconds.

Many local automobilists were at the Los Angeles races and it was with great interest that they watched the performances of the local cars. The Toledo owned by the National Automobile Company and driven by Bert Dingley, in most of the races, made a most consistent and remarkable showing throughout the meet. Especially did it make exceptionally good time in the fourth race on the opening day, and of its performance in this event the Los Angeles Times of November twenty-first said: 'Five machines came out for the fourth race, a five-mile affair like its predecessors. * * * Finally they got away and the Toledo was a winner from the start. The Tincher dropped out and the Flying Dutchman, Siebert in a Mercedes, ran a good second to the Toledo in the final mile, the Tourist being third. Time was 5:52 1-4. This race was for the Chanslor cup. * * * Time by miles was 1:12 3-4, 1:10 1-4, 1:10, 1:09 1-2, 1:09 3-4." H. D. Ryus in the White, the same machine that raced at Ingleside, did far better at Los Angeles. Especially did he do good work in the last race on Saturday, and of this race the Los Angeles Herald said: "But the most remarkable feature of the afternoon was Ryus's work with Hawkins's White car. This machine was entered in the ten mile race and though hopelessly outclassed by both of Oldfield's racers, the White succeeded in breaking the world's record for cars of its class. Ryus took a leaf out of Oldfield's book and began hugging the rail and driving hard on the turns. The best mile the White made was in 1:06 and the time for the ten miles was 11:20, lowering the world's record by almost half a minute. At the five mile mark the White had five miles the best of the record, which was 5:55, Ryus driving it in 5:50 flat."



An enthusiastic admirer of the Toledo writes me as follows in reference to the races:

"The Toledo duplicated its wonderful work at Ingleside at the Los Angeles races last week, winning three first an one second out of five entries. The second was obtained in the race against Barney Oldfield, and the Toledo defeated all of the other machines in this race. One of the most interesting features of the race was the Australian Pursuit race on Saturday, November twenty-first. The White Ghost was placed on the one-fourth pole, the Toledo on the one-half pole and the Tourist on the three-fourths pole. The rules require that the three start at the same time, and when one of the machines passes the one ahead of it, that machine which is passed must drop out of the race. Although, in order to catch the White touring car the Toledo had to overcome a handicap of three-fourths of a mile, it gained steadily until, after the sixth mile had been traveled, it then cut down the distance and caught up with the White, winning the magnificent trophy offered as first prize. In the contest for the beautiful Chanslor cup, donated by Joe Chanslor, the well known oil king, the Toledo met the famous Foxall Keene Mercedes in addition to the White touring cars and several others. From the records of the Mercedes, which was especially made to enter the Long Island track races last year, it was expected that the trophy would remain in Los Angeles, as the machine is now owned by Mr. Merritt, the capitalist, who paid twenty-two thousand dollars for it. However, the Toledo was equal to the occasion and succeeded in defeating the Mercedes as well as other machines without trouble, and established a new record for American made stock machines of five-fifty-two. The following day the Toledo also won the Shreve & Co. cup, which was open to cars of any description. The time for this race, while not quite as good as the preceding day, was 5:58, which is the second best time ever made by an American touring car."

An automobile run that is well worthy of mention was accomplished by Mr. A. E. Joy of Watsonville who about two weeks ago purchased a Winton touring car and left Frisco for his home city, accompanied by Mr. Calvin E. Eib. Rain and mud were little considered by these two automobilists and when the Oakland mole was left for a one hundred and ten mile run to Watsonville, it was pouring and the downpour kept up until the chug-wagon pulled up into San Jose. Here the first stop was made and the soaked autoists had some lunch. About three o'clock the big touring car was again started on its journey and in two hours the foot of San Juan grade was reached, after having literally ploughed through mud and water that ofttimes reached almost to the axles of the machine. And then they proceeded to climb the steep grade, which is not an easy task, even under favorable conditions. But it was accomplished and the distance from the foot of the grade to Mr. Joy's home—twelve miles—was covered in one hour and twenty minutes. The roads in the Pajaro Valley were almost impassable but the machine covered the whole distance in six hours and twenty minutes.

Mr. L. G. Rowell of Wells, Fargo & Co., this city, has just placed his order with the Pioneer Automobile Company for a 1904 Winton touring car, to be delivered February first. It will be remembered that Mr. Rowell is the gentleman from whom Dr. H. Nelson Jackson purchased his 1903 Winton touring car, with which he made his trip across the continent. Mr. Rowell purchased the machine for his own use last year and, when Dr. Jackson decided that the Winton was the best touring car for continental travel, it was impossible to get a machine. Dr. Jackson paid to Mr. Rowell a handsome bonus for his machine. Mr. Rowell's order makes the tenth received for 1904 Winton touring cars by the Pioneer Automobile Company.

Mr. S. H. Crocker, the companion of Dr. H. Nelson Jackson, arrived in San Francisco last Friday and looks none the worse for his trip. Mr. Crocker is very enthusiastic and states that it was a pleasure trip from start to finish. He also says that in the East there is a great deal of interest taken in the race across the continent proposed by Dr. Jackson. There are several well known Eastern people who are ready to make such a trip and it is not unlikely that Mr. Crocker himself will be in a trip of this kind. Since leaving San Francisco Mr. Crocker has toured the East.

new operas, and it is to be hoped that new people are under engagement. I know of only one absolutely new under contract. I refer to Mr. Wallace Brownlow, the English baritone, and I predict for him a warm welcome. His voice is reminiscent of Haydon Coffin. From all that I have heard of his achievements in light opera he will prove one of the strongest drawing cards the Tivoli ever had. I believe the new comic opera season will be opened with a revival of "Ixion" for the holiday season.

At the Columbia will be given tomorrow night a production in German of "Im Weissen Roessl." The Blumenthal and Kadelburg comedy is one of the most amusing of works. It will be staged under the direction of Arthur Becker.

Mrs. Arristine Schultz will give a musical matinee next Thursday at two-thirty o'clock in Century hall. She will be assisted by Arthur Weiss, 'cello, and Gyula Ormay, piano. An interesting program is announced and among the numbers are two new songs by Shafter Howard.

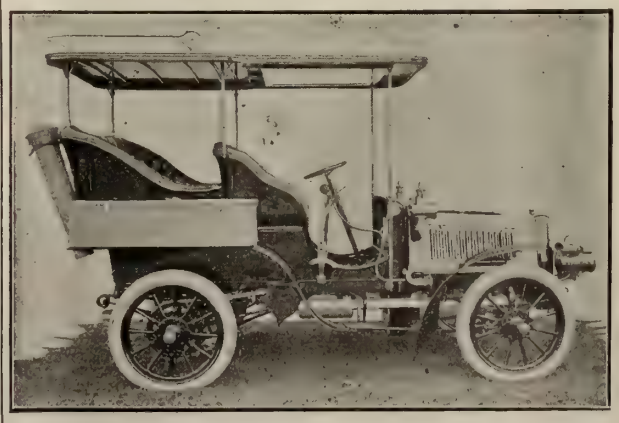
Annie Abbot, the Little Georgia Magnet, succeeds in mystifying the Orpheum audience this week. She invites a number of men from the audience to come on the stage as an investigating committee and then sets them to work trying to wrest a pole from her hands, lift her from the ground, and a number of other things which she resists without apparent effort. The gallery is intensely interested in her art and mercilessly jeer the men when they fail to lift the little woman. Searl and Violet Allen have an absurd but amusing skit called "The Sign Painter," which serves as an admirable vehicle for their talents. Both are good dancers.

The demand for seats at the Grand during the past week was unprecedented. Intense interest was aroused in "Ben Hur" throughout the State, and there was a great rush of people from the interior to see the play. Ralph Pincus, the publicity promoter of the show, spread the fame of "Ben Hur" from Siskiyou to San Diego, and demonstrated that it pays to appeal to our country cousins when there is a big attraction in town. Portland and Seattle are the only other towns on the coast in which the play will be produced.

Large Audiences to Greet Tyndall

The extraordinary psychic powers of Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall were again exemplified last Sunday night at Steinway hall, by some of the most remarkable demonstrations of thought-transference, thought-reading, clairvoyance and psychometry that the scientist has yet given in San Francisco. The large audience was made up of refined and educated people. In it were doctors, lawyers, law-makers, educators, and many women well known in San Francisco society. It was an appreciative audience, as well as one that was critical and observant. Many of those present had delved more or less into the occult, while the demonstrations of psychic phenomena puzzled many who have given little thought to the science. Tomorrow evening Tyndall's subject will be "The Secret of Thought-reading." The demonstration will include some new and startling features. On Sunday, December sixth, the subject will be "Proofs of Immortality."

Eleanor Haber's Recital



Pretty Eleanor Haber, the niece of George H. Davis, the Central's manager, is just back from Portland where she was a member of the Neill company. Miss Haber was made much of by society in Portland, and was persuaded to give a monologue recital while there. The Portland papers spoke very well of it, and predicted a bright future for the ambitious young actress. Miss Haber will give her first monologue recital here since her return from New York, next Friday evening in Steinway hall. It will be something out of the common, for all the monologues are new and some of them were written especially for Miss Haber. One of them, "Mrs. Benton's Easter Bonnet," tells of the troubles arising from a wrongly delivered millinery box. "The Book Canvasser" shows some of the worries that fall to the lot of harassed housekeepers interrupted in their work. "Graduation" will be appreciated by the sweet girl graduate and her relatives and friends.

As Russell Played It

Mr. James Durkin of the Alcazar stock is not of the meteoric variety of actors. He reveals himself in the histrionic firmament gradually. There appears to be no limit to his versatility. Up to this week no one that had seen him in conventional lover roles would have imagined that he could have adapted himself to the part of Noah Vale, in "A Poor Relation." There was a time when I firmly believed that Sol Smith Russell was unique, in the profession; that his success in the portrayal of a Yankee type was due to the facilities afforded him by nature, and that as the playwrights fitted parts to him, nobody else could have played them as he did. After seeing James Durkin as Noah Vale I have changed my views. I have been assured that Mr. Durkin never saw Sol Smith Russell. Then he must be acquitted of the suspicion of being a mere mimic, but it would not be to his discredit if he had the ability to give what appears to be such a remarkable imitation of the famous comedian. It would be mimicry of a high order. But Mr. Durkin's performance is an artistic impersonation, and it is given with conscientious fidelity. He plays Noah Vale to the life as Russell played the part. He has reincarnated the quaint hero of Kidder's old play. He wins your sympathy for the noble-hearted inventor, and compels you to smile grimly at his pathetic poverty, and his quaint humor. It is a splendid achievement for a stock actor with scarcely any preparation, to enter so thoroughly into the spirit of a role written for a man of unique personality, and to give such an eminently satisfactory performance. It is Mr. Durkin's privilege to begin where Sol Smith Russell left off. The play is interesting as a revival because it serves to emphasize the crudity of the drama in the recent past. "A Poor Relation" satisfied the blase theatregoer of a decade or so ago, just before the eternal sex problem began to engross our attention. It is a blending of melodrama and homespun comedy, and it is full of the old-fashioned heart interest. The villainous villain is there in all his villainy, and even the heartless, scheming stepmother takes a hand in the development of complications. A valuable paper is stolen, and the accusation is made against the innocent and noble heroine. The situations are intensely theatric, the humor is archaic, and the pathos is bathetic, but the heart interest grips you, and the sentiment is wholesome and refreshing. The support that Mr. Durkin gets is far superior to any that ever Sol Smith Russell enjoyed. Mr. George Osbourne seeks to produce an illusion with a moustache that was probably designed for a pirate. Mr. Osbourne, however, is a nice, kind-hearted old gentleman in the play. Luke Conness is the villain, and he steals the inventor's plans in a way that almost wins a hiss. Marie Howe is the stepmother, and she talks like one. The acoustics of the Alcazar are so good that I always wonder why Miss Howe uses her voice as though she longed for a megaphone. Frances Starr does a neat character bit as Scallops, and Adele Block is an unobtrusive heroine.

JAMES DURKIN.

This is a very excellent and hitherto unpublished picture of James Durkin, the most versatile leading man ever at the Alcazar. There could be more no more striking contrast than his stalwart, dashing, deep-toned Gil de Berault, the soldier of fortune in "Under the Red Robe," and his attenuated, awkward and querulous voiced Noah Vale in "A Poor Relation," which is to be seen for another week.

CECIL COWLES.

The nine-year-old pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt who will give a piano recital in Steinway hall next Thursday evening.

Attractions Ahead

The Alcazar has a busy month ahead. After another week of "A Poor Relation" it will give the first San Francisco production of "A Royal Prisoner," a comedy drama of Russian romance, which turns upon the pivot of mistaken identity a la "Prisoner of Zenda." Then comes a revival of "The Girl I Left Behind Me," in which Adele Block will have strong dramatic opportunities as Kate Kennion. It was in this role that she made her stage debut in the East. For the holiday season there will be an elaborate production of "Blue Jeans," with its barbecue, buzz-saw and brass band.

With eight additional musicians just arrived from the old country Ellery's Royal Italian Band will begin a return engagement at the Alhambra Sunday night, December sixth. The repertoire of the band will embrace a great variety of styles of music and some fine special nights are being arranged. The opening night will be devoted mainly to compositions of the modern Italian composers, a magnificent selection from Puccini's "La Tosca" being one of the features. The prices for this engagement will be popular and good reserved seats can be had as low as twenty-five cents. Matinees will be given on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday.

A benefit for the California Women's Hospital will be given at the Alhambra next Friday afternoon. The program will be an elaborate one, including many distinct novelties. The cause is a worthy one and the house will undoubtedly be packed.

Her Prerogative Refused

Maud Lillian Berri, the Fresno prima donna, has resigned from "The Sultan of Sulu" cast because Manager Savage would not permit her to select her own dressing-room. As a consequence her husband, Frank Moulan, has given notice of his intention to quit. Moulan was unknown in New York until he made his appearance in "The Sultan of Sulu" at Wallack's. His work there put him in the front rank of comic opera comedians. Colonel Savage has a prejudice against stars and he is a stickler for discipline. As the prima donna usually has the choice of dressing-rooms, Savage's denial of the privilege to Mrs. Moulan might indicate that he desired a change in his company.

Features of Next Week's Bills

There will be a very large and fashionable audience at Fischer's on Monday night when "I. O. U.," the burlesque written by Judson C. Brusie and Dr. H. J. Stewart, will have its premier. It is said that the management of the theatre has such confidence that this burlesque will be an instant success that it has offered five thousand dollars in advance for an interest in its American and European rights. Much money has been spent on "I. O. U." and the scenery and costumes will be sumptuous and artistic. The plot is based upon the story of three hotel proprietors, who become financially embarrassed by reason of having housed and fed a circus outfit, which also becomes bankrupt and therefore unable to pay for its board and lodging. As a compromise a trade is made whereby the circus manager exchanges his circus for the hotel property, and the landlords become owners of the circus with such direful consequences as to bring about a re-transfer, the circus man going back to the sawdust ring and the landlords returning to their hotel. The situations are rendered interesting and very funny, by reason of the complications which arise from the manipulations of a Labor Union walking delegate. In the course of the comedy this definition of a corporation is given: "A Corporation is an aggregation of men, sanctioned by law to do what individuals wouldn't dare to do." A trust is described in this way:

"Corporations eat up companies—
Companies eat up Copartnerships,
Copartnerships eat up individuals,
And trusts eat up the whole cheese."

Shafts of satire are directed against the modern development of combinations, industrial and commercial. The Althea twins will make their first appearance in "I. O. U."

It is safe to say that "Way Down East" will be a strong drawing card at the Columbia. The New England drama is not new here, but the people like it, the clergy approve it, and it always draws. William Lamp, who is with the company, will receive a warm welcome Monday night. Lamp was a matinee idol when he was playing leading juvenile roles at the Alcazar two seasons back.

The regular combination season at the Grand will begin at tomorrow's matinee with Rowland and Clifford's "Over Niagara Falls." This play is from the pen of Jos. Le Brandt, author of "On the Stroke of Twelve," "Caught in the Web," and other well known dramatic successes, and is claimed to be his best effort. It abounds in sensational climaxes, and is possessed of a strong plot which is skilfully unfolded. The characters include Starlight, an old Indian chief, Asa Phillips, a pillar of the church, a circus equestrienne and a French ring master, a ubiquitous newspaper reporter, a mischievous, fun-loving darkey and an old Irish guide. The scenic and electrical effects are most elaborate and plentiful, the one showing the Falls by moonlight being a revelation in the scenic artist's world. Others notable for their ingenuity are beautiful Lake Chautauqua, Goat Island above the Falls, the Whirlpool Rapids and Suspension Bridge, all of which are depicted in a strikingly true and realistic manner. The usual prices, fifteen cents, twenty-five cents, fifty cents and seventy-five cents, will prevail, and the regular matinees will take place every Thursday, Saturday and Sunday.

"A Poor Relation" will go all next week at the Alcazar to satisfy the demand.

The Central's Chinatown melodrama has drawn large houses. It will have an even more startling and sensational drama to follow, "The Counterfeiters," which was an enormous hit in the East. The scenery will be as picturesque as usual. There is no theatre in San Francisco that can beat the Central on scenic sensations and mechanical effects. In "The Counterfeiters" opening act there is a robbery and murder in Wall street, and the Hal Godfrey, the "Private Secretary of Vaudeville," will appear with his company at the Orpheum in a one-act playlet by Arthur J. Lamb "A Very Bad Boy." Agnes Mahr, "The American Tommy Atkins," will be seen in new dances. Clarice Vance, who sings coon songs, will reappear after a long absence. The bill will also include Joseph Newman, the Denver song writer, who appeared here three seasons ago. The Thursday matinee is sure to be popular.

At the Chutes will be Conley and Klein, singing and dancing comedians, the La Moines, novelty musicians, Flood and Hayes, barrel jumpers, and Stanley and Villard, presenting their original creation, "Mrs. O'Grady's Wash Day," making their first appearances here. —The Playgoer.

In Financial Circles

Total transactions in the Stock and Bond Exchange aggregate $90,000 in bonds and 2,963 in shares, divided as follows: 1,270 Gas and Electric; 838 S. V. Company; 335 miscellaneous; 500 Sugar and 20 bank shares. Compared to the former activity in trade which the brokers enjoyed for a long time, this is quite a falling off, and is somewhat surprising in view of the steady increase of business in all other lines.

The Gas & Electric Co. declared a dividend of $2.50 per share, payable on December 24th, as predicted, yet the announcement had no effect on the price of the stock. The S. V. Company has perfected its organization. The capital stock now consists of 280,000 shares with an authorized bond issue of 28 millions.

Alaska Packers has declined to 142 1-2 under light sales and regained about $2. The salmon catch is reported to be extremely satisfactory, and also the prices realized from sales, still there has been a steady, unostentatious supply of stock. Sugar stocks have been dull. The public declines to construe the Cuban Reciprocity Treaty as detrimental to the sugar industry. This view is erroneous. —The Financier.

The Sad Tale of an Epicure

A bachelor man, having had his single condition thrown up to him so many times as the acme of selfishness, and being tired of having his kind held up to obloquy as a menace to the nation, decided to change his manner of life. He made up his mind to marry.

And, like all men who have lived lives that knew nothing of self-denial, he looked about him for a bride, but not among women who knew life as he knew it, but among innocent young girls.

Finally he picked out one who seemed to fill all the requirements. She was pretty, of good birth, well bred, moderately dotted, and accustomed to moving in good society. Her mother approved the bachelor's intentions and permitted her daughter even to dine with him in public places.

It was the dinner, as it happened, that destroyed the bachelor's beautiful dream. The first time he chose a most ravishing menu, with delicacies that would warm the heart of a blase gourmet. He looked to see an answering glow of satisfaction upon the charming face of his young companion. But she ate through the menu as if it had been beefsteak and fried potatoes, and only once did she utter a comment. It was when he asked her if she cared for dessert.

"Oh, yes, I must have a big heaping dish of icecream," she said.

His face fell, but he charged the crime to her youthful exuberance, and the next night he supped her after the theatre.

He was cogitating whether the frogs' legs should have a Rhine wine or champagne to wash them down when a musical voice interposed:

"Please don't give me anything but a large dish of icecream. I still have a crush on that, you know, though I've been 'out' a whole season."

He felt dejected but thought he ought by all means to give her another trial. It would be wrong to condemn this lovely girl after two trials. He resolved to appeal to the luncheon as a supreme court.

She agreed at once that a luncheon was the sweetest meal one could eat, and he said she might choose the menu herself.

"Oh, no," she answered, "I never could bear to order anything for a man. You get what you want and I'll take—wait a minute," and she scanned the menu carefully. "I'll take—let me see—oh, I don't care for anything but shrimp salad and—well, I reckon a dish of icecream to finish on."

His love dream collapsed like a toy balloon. The mamma wondered why the bachelor no longer paid attentions to her daughter, and she was one of his most carping critics when his marriage was announced with a widow. She couldn't know, of course, that the widow was an epicure.

The Widow's Year

Letters from Portia Pomeroy to her friend, Mary Martens.

June 10.

Dear Mary,

I feel disconsolate. I am not one of those who can exhaust their grief in a fortnight of tears, and then freshen up as the flowers do when the sun melts the dewdrops. There is no sun for me. With the passing of my husband I feel a terrible loneliness—you can't realize it, Mary, because you've never been married. Even when one hasn't a passionate love for one's mate, one gets used to him—yes, that's it; the "used to" feeling is a part of our daily life. I never loved Roland as he loved me. I used to hate myself sometimes when he lavished the wealth of his love on me, for I couldn't return in kind. But he was satisfied, oh yes, he never knew. I am a woman; i. e., an actress. What woman doesn't act sometimes—if not every day, every hour, every instant of her life? Rowland thought my passion for him was as intense as his for me. He adored me. He thought me the most beautiful, the cleverest, the best gowned, the Incomparable of our set. He was always so proud of me when we went out together. Yet I know, Mary dear, that there are plenty of women who discount and double-discount me in all the possessions I have named. But Rowland would not have it so. I don't know why I think of all these things now that he is gone. I know, dear, that I shall never cease to mourn his loss.

Your lonely Portia.

July 10.

Mary sweetheart,

Your letters have been such a comfort to me. You are such a mine of sympathy. It is so lovely to know one has a friend whose soul speaks to one's soul, one with whom I am never afraid of being misunderstood. I read a little bit of your last letter to a new acquaintance of mine today. He is such a fine fellow, a Mr. Jackson from Chicago. He came with a letter of introduction to poor dear Rowland—just think of that, but then he had been to several other cities before he reached here, and didn't know of my loss. Of course he came up to offer his condolences—that's how I happened to read him part of your letter. He reminds me of you—his smile is so cordial, his hand-clasp so sincere. * * *I had to leave this, dear, for Mr. Jackson came for me to take a little automobile spin through the Park. I did not think it quite right, with poor Rowland only a month in his grave, but Mr. Jackson said it is quite out of date for widows to stay indoors and mope and spoil their complexions. There seemed so much solid sense in that remark that I decided to go. I feel so refreshed by the outing. We stopped at a florist's and bought a big bunch of roses, long-stemmed La France, and I had Marie take them to the cemetery as soon as I returned home. Rowland was always so fond of roses—he used to keep me supplied with them during the season, and out of it, too, for he was very extravagant in some things. Good-bye, dear. Do write soon, for your letters cheer me up so when I am blue.

Lovingly, Portia.

Darling Mary,

Do you really think, as you wrote me, that I could venture to appear in white waists? I am simply smothering in black—and I never looked well in black next my face. I was wearing a white kimona yesterday, a stunning thing of China crepe that was one of poor Rowland's last gifts—you remember what a genius he had for buying negligees and fine lingerie—when Mr. Laurence was announced. It was such a frightfully warm day, I concluded to receive him in the kimona. Don't be shocked, dear, for it is quite proper now to wear Oriental costumes in the day time in one's own house—and Mr. L. is a very old friend. He was best man at my wedding, and was a school chum of Rowland's. The first thing he said was:

"Always wear white."

"But I have to wear black," I answered, without half taking in the sense of the remark.

"Make it white as soon as you can," he returned.

"But white is for virgin brides only," I retorted.

And then I realized how frivolous it was to talk that way—with Rowland's death only two months agone. We began to talk about serious things. But Mr. Laurence never can be serious very long. He's always laughing and telling clever stories. I made him tell me one I'd often wished to hear, one that Rowland never would tell me, but which I knew he knew and that Mr. L. knew. Rowland was overnice in some things, Mary. He always refrained from telling me the good stories he heard at the club. He said they weren't fit for my dainty ears to hear. You know Rowland believed me most opposed to anything like coarseness. And indeed I am—but there's a vast difference between the risque and the vulgar. Mr. L.'s story was just a wee bit Frenchy, but it had a brilliant point. Every time I've felt blue since then I've thought of that story—and laughed myself into cheerfulness. When you come to visit me, dear, I'll tell it to you—it won't do to write it. On second thoughts, I'll get Mr. L. to tell it to you himself.

Your devoted Portia.

September 10.

Mary dearest,

Do you think I've done a very dreadful thing? I had just returned from the cemetery, where I had wept myself into positive ugliness, when the 'phone rang. It was Mr. Gray—a dear, delightful man who often used to dine with us when poor Rowland was alive. He asked me if he might come and take me for a drive, the day being so balmy. Well, Mary, I felt so sad and wretched that I welcomed any change, and immediately accepted. I wore a thin white waist, but nobody of course noticed it under my sealskin. We had lunch at Uncle Tom's Cabin and drove as far as Burlingame. I enjoyed every minute, though don't for a minute think I forgot Rowland. We spoke of him several times. Mr. Gray handles the reins divinely. Poor Rowland never did drive well. He wasn't a bit of a sportsman. Au revoir, love. Write soon. Portia.

October 10.

Dear Mary,

I have bought myself a new gown of thin black gauze which I shall wear at dinner while I am at the Millers. Do you think it will be wrong if I have the bodice lining cut low and sleeveless? You know the gauze will cover the skin—and this is the warmest season of the year there. The Bowmans persuaded me to go with them. There's to be a hunt ball while we are there but of course I wouldn't think of attending that. The Millers give lovely house parties, and all the guests are quite congenial. The Bowmans said it is quite proper to accept invitations to country-places even when one is in mourning. I shall leave tomorrow. I have left orders at the florist's to have fresh flowers always laid on Rowland's grave while I'm away.

Always your loving Portia.

November 10.

Dear Mary,

I wish you were here. It is such a beautiful place and the Millers and their guests are so charming. There's one of the men —a man you would adore at once—who writes the most enchanting poetry. I suppose it's what you'd call erotic verse, but it's delightful. He reads it to me himself, as we lounge under the trees when the others are off playing golf or tennis. It is all about languorous feelings, intense passions, souls blending with hearts, and white arms twining about strong brown throats, and that sort of thing. It is very fascinating, particularly to me to whom all that sort of thing is so new. You know Rowland always hated anything like Swinburnian poetry. He said that Longfellow was good enough for him. My poet has taught me so much about rhythm and rhyme. He says he will write a sonnet to my perfect lips. I know, dear, this sounds silly to you—but think how lonely I am with poor dear Rowland no longer here.

Your desolate Portia.

December 10.

Dear Mary,

Back home again—and oh, how lonely it is! You don't know, dear, what it is to have had—and lost! I shall go wild if I must bear this terrible pain much longer—the bitterness of being alone. Can't you come and visit me awhile?

Your weeping Portia.

January 10.

Dearest Mary,

What a brilliant mentality is yours! Since you couldn't come yourself, how dear of you to send a substitute. And such a woman! Your cousin Cecilia is the best joy-maker I ever met. Such a fund of spirits! Such stories—club stories, too (oh, fie!). She mixed me a cocktail first thing—said she never knew anything better as a bracer when one is blue. Then she invited two of her men friends to dinner—and one of them was that charming Mr. Jackson of Chicago, who is in town for a few days. Your cousin made me turn in the neck of my crepe de chine gown. She was decollete, herself. We had a charming dinner—she supervised it all. We are going to dine at the Black Poodle tomorrow with Mr. Jackson and another man, a New York friend of his. We shall go upstairs, as of course I couldn't be seen in the public dining-room, only seven months a widow. Thanks, ever so much, for sending your cousin to me. Portia.

February 10.

Dear Mary,

Just a line, for I am dreadfully rushed. Cecilia has kept me going out to dinner, or lunch, or driving, ever since she came. She leaves tomorrow. Mr. Gray is giving her a farewell automobile drive and a dinner to follow at the Club, today, so I have just time to send this off before I dress. I had to get a new black chiffon gown for the affair. Cecilia made me have it cut demi-decollete and with half-sleeves. I am just sending Marie to the cemetery with some chrysanthemums. It is three weeks since I was able to get there myself, but then I have been so rushed.

Portia.

March 10.

Darling Mary,

I feel very lonely and sad today. Mr. Jackson left for Chicago this A. M. and I went down to see him off. He is such a dear, kind, sympathetic fellow. I suppose he will make some pretty young Chicago girl a magnificent husband some day. After leaving the ferry I went out to the cemetery. It seemed ages since I was there. Weeds had grown around the grave—yet I have always paid my cemetery dues. How careless and neglectful gardeners are! It made me feel so miserable I don't think I shall go there again.

Lovingly, Portia.

April 10.

Dear Mary,

Do you think it would be sinful if I introduced a bit of white into my Easter hat? It is now a good many months since poor Rowland passed away. I suppose nobody has kept count of the actual time, and it is really nearly a year. I am getting dreadfully tired of black—and it is so unbecoming. Rowland never could abide me in black—and surely I should try to please his taste as much now as when he was alive. Don't you think so?

Portia.

May 10.

Mary, dear girl,

I hate to tell you—and yet I don't believe you'll scold me. I am going to be married—tomorrow. Yes, I knew you'd say Mr. Jackson, but you're not making a good guess. I like Mr. J.—yes, and when we dined together it's true I did let him kiss me, as I wrote you. He wasn't the only one, either—now, don't preach, dear. I'll tell you all about it, and why I have decided that Mr. Laurence and no other shall be the one. You know I often told you how I felt toward Rowland—that I never could truly respond to his caresses. I pretended—and I liked him very much, and I did not know anything different, and so it didn't matter much since he was satisfied. But during my widowhood I have had some experience—I have let myself have experience. And the fruit is—Mr. Laurence. He's all that Rowland wasn't. I am all fire in his presence. He warms my very soul. And, you know, Mary, what that clever old matron told us—that widows should never stay widows, that they ought to give some man the benefit of their experience. For the last time, Mary, I write myself

The Trifler

A certain young lady was engaged to be married. The fiance departed for Australia on business before the engagement was made known, and in his absence Mabel thought better of her promise when she found a cabinet minister at her feet. In order to let the old lover down as easily as possible she wrote to him representing herself as a victim of parental compulsion, but, of course, his own and only Mabel. The average and ordinary man would have let it go at that, and of the exceptions, nine out of ten would have formed plans for stealing her even at the altar steps. Trefusis was the tenth. He probably did not take any stock in Mabel's representations, but at all events he was one who never let an offense go unpunished, and in consequence, immediately after her marriage to Lord Trewint, Mabel received a beautifully printed volume containing all her letters to her former lover. It was set forth in the preface that these had fallen into the hands of a third person who took this means of vindicating her reputation and proving to her friends that she was not a flirt. Naturally, the bride of a cabinet minister, married but a few weeks, could not view with complacency the prospect of having duplicate copies sent to her friends, much less letting her husband see in cold print her vehement declaration that she hated and loathed him. In this juncture her brother-in-law comes to the rescue. She confides her troubles to him and exacts a promise that he will secure not only the original letters but all the copies of the printed volume. This young man is "The Trifler," who gives title to the story. He has made the mistake of concluding that because his brother never had married he never would do so; that it was only a question of time when he would inherit both title and estate, and therefore he was justified in idling his time and occupying himself seriously only in playing cricket. For the sake of averting scandal, if for nothing else, Fred undertakes his sister-in-law's commission, and burglarizes the safe in which the documents are locked away. Out of this act grow all sorts of complications, for the vengeful Trefusis transfers his hatred from Mabel to Fred, takes an active interest in defeating the Trewint candidate for the House, leads the son into crime and the daughter into folly, and pretty generally plays the devil. The Trifler, having plenty of idle time on his hands, is the Deus ex machina, and with the assistance of Mabel, whose vanity has been the root of all the evil, he reinstates poor, foolish Molly, sees her happily married to the man of her choice and brings her pompous and pig-headed father to reason. For a bit of light literature with no moral, unless it be that women should not be left alone with pen and ink, "The Trifler" is not bad. It is by Archibald Syre, and reprinted from the Smart Set.

Geraldine Bonner's Latest

In "Tomorrow's Tangle" Geraldine Bonner has given a different picture of the California pioneer in his later days from that which was set forth in "Hard-Pan." This time we see him when success has crowned all his efforts and he has reached heights of which he did not dream in his early days. Lucy Fraser, a child of barely fifteen years, motherless daughter of a Methodist preacher on his way to California for his health, was married to Jake Shackleton, driver of one of the emigrant teams at St. Louis, not because the girl was in love with him but because her father, feeling his end to be near, thought this the best provision to make, and Lucy was one of the submissive sort who always did as she was bade. She was not of the rugged material of which pioneer wives are best formed, and by the time they reached Salt Lake City and the father was dead, Jake had repented of his bargain. In the city of the saints he found another woman more to his liking and joined the new religion in order to marry her. Having secured the wife he wanted the family renewed their journey across the Nevada desert, where, within an hour, the prematurely aged girl wife passed through the double agony of seeing one child die and bearing another, her sympathetic husband regarding both as unwarranted delays in his journey goldward. Three weeks later the caravan, with the horses dropping in their harness and the human beings scarcely in better condition, came to the cabin of two miners in the Sierras. Here Shackleton traded off his wife and baby for a pair of horses and proceeded on his way. One of the mining partners proved dishonest, and taking the remaining horse and all the proceeds of the summer's work he deserted Moreau, leaving him to be snowed in with the abandoned wife and baby. In the spring they were married, both fully understanding that the step was not legal but regarding it as the best thing under the circumstances. There were only five who knew of the transaction and each had the best of reasons for maintaining silence. All this is preliminary to the story proper. Twenty-five years later Shackleton is a man of affairs. He has won wealth and position and has his Nob Hill mansion and his place at Menlo Park. The Mormon wife still lives, and has proved herself a good bargain, and there are a son and daughter who are as unsatisfactory to their father as was poor Lucy, his first wife. They are dominated and brow-beaten by their masterful father and overshadowed by their capable mother, given no opportunity to develop individuality and yet blamed because they do not shine forth like planets in their firmaments. Their case is not eased by the meeting between their father and his eldest legitimate child. Her mother is dying and her putative father is already dead, leaving his family in straightened circumstances. Mariposa, the daughter, has developed into a beauty, with a phenomenal voice, and it is under the guise of a patron of the arts that Shackleton is introduced to her—the millionaire who is anxious to assist the budding genius. It is at this point that the tangle begins. The death of Lucy is followed almost immediately by that of Shackleton. There is developed a game of cross purposes with Mariposa, the daughter, and the Shackleton millions as a storm centre. Mrs. Shackleton of course knows the legal aspects of her position. She makes a liberal offer to Mariposa, to send her to Europe to cultivate her voice, ostensibly to carry out her late husband's intentions, but really to remove the girl as far as possible from the chance of making discoveries. Mariposa refuses to take advantage of the offer. Is she actuated solely by motives of independence, or has she, by chance, in overlooking her mother's effects, made important discoveries? Does she know or does she only suspect, and how much? Barry Essex, who is connected with the Daily Trumpet, one of Shackleton's many enterprises, and who is aptly described as an imitation gentleman, has long regarded Mariposa as a paying bit of property if he can obtain her on his own terms. He has stumbled upon the truth of the situation. He too has his scheme. Can he manage to marry her in her ignorance and then bring a suit in her name for the major part of the Shackleton millions? Is the proof in his hands adequate, or is there other and stronger evidence to be got by fair means or foul? Or will he have to satisfy himself with mere threats and blackmail, or a substantial settlement to ward off scandal? Is it by any means possible that Mariposa knows everything and has all the proofs she needs, so that he can make no claim either upon her or upon the Shackletons? Knowing what the records of our probate courts can show in the way of sensational litigation and the crop of widows and orphans that springs up whenever a rich man dies, to say nothing of the shamelessness of the scandals unearthed whenever a few dollars are to be gained, it ought not to be difficult to forecast the outcome of the case. What Mariposa did do, how much she knew or suspected, and why she elected to follow that course, the reader must discover for himself. Win Shackleton, the son, who, with the dominating presence of his father removed, discovers unexpected capacity, rises above the sordid level of the money-changers and deserved better parentage than he was given. The principal interest is naturally concerned with Mariposa but her story is by no means the only one. There are kaleidoscopic views of society in various phases and inside pictures of yellow journalism. The Garcia family, with the Spanish grandmother, the feeble and inefficient mother, and the two masterful young barbarians, is drawn very close to life, and one wonders how many mothers can look their children in the eyes and assure themselves that they are honestly fulfilling their duties any more effectually than Elsie does. Mrs. Willers, the newspaper woman with her capable workaday manner and her industry which supports herself and her little daughter, in contrast to her efforts at style and an arch, society pose, is typical. Those who find any additional pleasure in fitting names and local habitations to the characters are at liberty to do so. As a picture of San Francisco life and society when Nob Hill was new, "Tomorrow's Tangle" is altogether satisfactory. The complications which involve the characters are not less probable than many which have been aired in court; to say nothing of those which have been kept from publicity because there was no fortune at stake. MUSIC

A New Singer

Mrs. Richard Rees, who sang at the Latimer pupil exhibition in Maple hall last week, has one of the best cultivated voices that I have heard for many a day. The audience grew quite enthusiastic over her, as well they might. It often happens this way that in a drawing-room or at a private affair it is one's privilege to hear far finer music than one ever gets at a concert. Mrs. Rees has a voice full of feeling and with a rarely sympathetic tone. It is a voice capable of interpreting Wagner's tone poems to perfection. Mr. Garner S. Stenhouse also contributed two songs to the program, and Mrs. Wilbur Zeigler recited in a charming manner.

A Piano Recital by Cecil Cowles

Hugo Mansfeldt has presented many talented juvenile pupils, during his years of teaching, but in Cecil Cowles he has more than a merely clever child. Little Cecil is only nine years of age, but she already shows the artistic temperament developed to a high degree. She has played at some women's club affairs and next Thursday evening in Steinway hall will give a piano recital which will embrace works by Mozart, Rheinberger, Schumann, Floersheim, Sinding, Brahms, Chopin and Dvorak. She will also give two of her own compositions, for young as she is little Cecil already shows gifts of composition that would be considered rare in an older musician.

The San Francisco Musical Club will give a most interesting program on December seventeenth. It will be in charge of Miss Ella V. McCloskey, and Mozart's Grand Requiem Mass will be sung by a large chorus of prominent solists, with organ, piano and orchestral accompaniment. Dr. H. J. Stewart will direct the program, which will be given in Lyric hall. On November nineteenth the club's program was in charge of Mrs. John McGraw, and Mediæval Dance Forms were discussed.

Wouldn't Force Her Voice

One of the interesting events announced for the earlier part of the New York opera season is Madame Gadski's first appearance in this country as Brunhilda. Several times Mr. Grau urged her to undertake the heavier soprano roles in Wagnerian repertoire, but she refused, saying that she wanted her voice to develop before forcing it. She now feels that she is able to undertake such roles.

The program at Andrew Bogart's recital in Maple hall next Thursday evening will be: Songs of the seventeenth century—The Happy Lover, Lacia li dir, Drinking Song; songs by Robert Schumann—My Love Lay Thy Hand, 'Twas in the Month of May, When thro' the Piazzetti, Row, Gently Row; songs by modern American composers—Bring Her Again to Me, N. Clifford Page, Absent, John W. Metcalf, Folk Song, G. W. Chadwick, and An Open Secret, R. Huntington Woodman. More than the average amount of interest is being manifested in the recital.

The musicale at the Hopkins was held this week on Wednesday evening, Thursday being Thanksgiving. Under Henry Heyman's direction the following good program was rendered: Organ, Allegro Maestro, Mendelssohn, Otto Fleissner; song for baritone, A Flower's Sorrow, Coverly, F. Dudley Moss; violin, Andante Cantabile, Sgambati, Miss Madeline Todd; soprano aria from Carmen, Miss Beulah George; organ, Invocation, Capocci, Mr. Fleissner; song, Until You Came, John W. Metcalf, Mr. Moss; violin, Romanze, Wilhelmj, Miss Todd; song, Summer, Chaminade, Miss George; organ, Marche Militaire, Barnes, Mr. Fleissner. The last concert of the series will take place next Thursday evening.

The Unitarian Club Concert

My Alameda correspondent writes me that the concert given by the Unitarian Club last week was considered the most successful in the club's history. Of the program, the critic of the Argus wrote: "The August Hinrichs string quartet gave the audience vast pleasure with its selections. * * * Mr. Vinson has a real tenor voice which he uses with exceeding taste; a voice which would make even a commonplace song appear like one of the elect. * * * Mr. Stark sang an aria from Verdi's 'Don Carlo,' and the famous Cantor's resonant baritone was especially suited by this selection. He sang also (by request) the Pagliacci Prologue, which has become the most beloved of latter-day 'big' solos for 'big' baritones. The Cantor's singing was full of passion and magnetism. He sang during the evening in Italian, English and French; and since German is his native tongue, he showed himself to have more acomplishments than his unusual vocal and musical ones. Miss Daisy Cohn's fluent and clear-cut soprano was also heard in Berignani's "Flower Song." It was given with much style and with archness. Her encore, Foote's Irish Folk song, gave opportunity for feeling and tenderness in which the singer was not found to be lacking. * * * Miss Clements and Mr. W. A. Sabin accompanied the strings and the singers in a most competent manner."

Ellery's Italian Band in the New Greek Theatre

Manager Greenbaum has arranged for a concert to be given for the establishment of a musical and dramatic fund at the Berkeley University, in the new Greek theatre, by the Ellery Royal Italian Band under Chiaffarelli. The date set is Wednesday afternoon, December ninth at two-thirty. San Franciscans should take the one or one-thirty boat. The program will be exceptionally fine and as the acoustics of this marvelous building, which seats over seven thousand people, are simply perfect, the tone quality of the organization will be heard to the greatest advantage. The seats are placed at the popular price of fifty cents, so that even with the railroad both ways one can attend the concert at a very moderate expense. It has been arranged that in case of rain the concert will be given in the gymnasium building of the University. Tickets can be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s any time after Tuesday, December second.

Miss Grace Freeman gave a violin recital in Y. M. C. A. Auditorium last Thursday evening, assisted by Mrs. F. A. Berlin, soprano, and Henry Salz, pianist, at which the following program was rendered: Piano and violin sonata in C minor; Reginella, Braga, Songs My Mother Taught Me, Dvorak, O, Fair Cheeks of Roses, Brahms; Prelude and Fugue for violin alone, Bach; Concerto in G minor, Bruch; Chanson Provencale, Del Acqua; Romanza, Sgambati, and Spanish Dances, Sarasate.

Mrs. L. Snider-Johnson will give a song recital on Tuesday evening, December eighth, at Y. M. C. A. Auditorium. The program is a very ambitious one, consisting of classics and standard songs and including two arias from the works of Von Weber and Tschaikowsky. Mrs. Johnson is the soprano of the First Congregational church of this city, and has been often heard since her concert debut last February. Dr. H. J. Stewart will assist and Miss Kathleen Parlow will give two violin numbers. The patronesses will be Mrs. George Adams, Mrs. John F. Merrill, Mrs. John S. Merrill, Miss Fannie Danforth, Mrs. W. R. Wheeler, Mrs. Harry S. Bates and Mrs. Louis R. Mead.

THE MAPLE LEAF ROUTE.

The Chicago Great Western Railway recently completed its road to Omaha. Through fast service has already been established to St. Paul and Minneapolis and by the first of December will be through to Chicago. The C. G. W. is the famous "Maple Leaf Route," noted for its fast service. San Franciscans who have traveled by this route swear by its attractions and general completeness. To give fast and good service is not the property of every road, and when a traveler finds these properties combined he naturally prefers the railway that owns them.

Travelers' Tales

The Bootjack Was Expensive

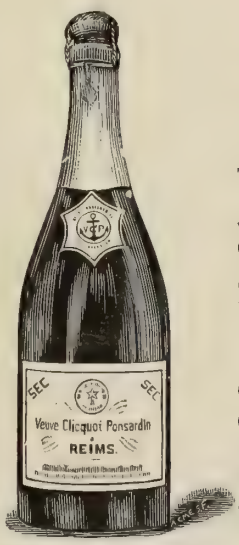
A Belgian hotel-keeper likes Russian customers. "They are large, see you," he states; "they dispute not the accounts. Once lodged himself with me a Count ——," he relates. "When he arrived I was not; I returned home from my circle; my wife was all frightened. She cry to me: 'Go speak to the Minister Russian. He beat all the waiters. He is in anger, but what an anger!' I asked of what it is question. One tells me the Count he insists that the waiters take him off his boots. They are brave Belgians; they will not. He strike them and they say stern follies. I had courage, I; I feared me not of him, I go to his room and say, 'Mr. the Count, I am the proprietor; what will you?' 'Sir,' he say, 'I will thank you pull me off the boots!' My first sentiment is de lui allonger une claque—to give him a smack; But I master myself, and say, 'Wait only two minutes, Mr. the Count; I have an order to give.' So I run to my wife and tell her to give me my dress coat, my gloves, gray-pearl, my gibus, my pantaloons black. In two minutes behold me, of great tenue. I go back to the Count; I say him, 'Only in dress of gala can the proprietor of this hotel take off your boots,' and, my faith, I take them off in one, two! He raise himself, bow himself and thank me very politely. By and by, in three weeks, he ask for his bill. I inscribe on it as extra, 'To taking off Mr. the Count's boots by the proprietor in a dress coat and gray-pearl gloves, one hundred francs.'"

A Negative Compliment

A distinguished Parisian visiting the United States, having received the photograph of a lady, asked a friend what was customary under the circumstances.

"Compliment it," replied the friend. "Tell her its beauty is very rare."

"I beg to make zee acknowledgmong, madame," he said to her at their next meeting. "Zee beauty of madame is vair scarce."



Appropriate Locations

A Yale graduate, who was a student about thirty years ago, said, in speaking of changes that had taken place since his time: "I never knew whether to attach any significance to it or not, but when I was there the Law School adjoined the jail, the Medical College was next the cemetery, and the Divinity School was on the road to the poorhouse."

From Lorrimer's "Letters of a Self Made Merchant to His Son":

I've always found worrying a blamed sight more uncertain than horse-racing —it's harder to pick a winner at it.... Worrying is the one game in which if you guess right, you don't get any satisfaction out of your smartness. A busy man has no time to bother with it. He can always find plenty of old women, in skirts or trousers, to spend their days worrying over their own troubles and to sit up nights making his. The time to do your worrying is when a thing is all over, and the way to do it is to leave it to the neighbors.

Conspiracy Against the Law

The attitude of the law officers of this city toward Alexander Garnett, the murderer of Major J. W. McClung, gives the impression that there is to be no very strenuous effort made to impose upon the assassin the penalty of his crime. It appears that everybody directly concerned is anxious that the murder should be forgotten as soon as possible and that it should be considered a family affair in which the public has no interest. So intense is the desire for the stifling of publicity that the presumption is warranted that the motif of the crime was not of such a trivial nature as has been represented. However, the enforcement of the law is a matter of much greater importance to the people of this State than are the feelings of those who were involved in a scandal through the violence of a hot-headed ruffian. It is the duty of the law officers of this city to prosecute murderer Garnett just as they would an ordinary hod-carrier or tenderloin habitue, and for their own good is behooves them to manifest a little more zeal and sincerity than they have hitherto shown. So far they have acted as though they were engaged in the preliminary scenes of a farce. There have been very strong indications of collusion between the defendant's friends and the authorities. Instead of collecting evidence for the prosecution they have been "standing in" with the defense. Even the Assistant District Attorney, who was detailed to procure the dying statement of Major McClung, obtained a worthless paper. It is not what it purports to be and therefore cannot be introduced in evidence. It should be interesting to watch developments, and observe to what extremes the officers of the law will go in disregard of their sworn duty, to save the neck of an influential loafer.

More Hangings Needed

A jury in Judge Carroll Cook's court found a man guilty of murder in the first degree, the other day, and then fixed the penalty at life imprisonment. As it was an atrocious murder without a single extenuating circumstance that could be urged in behalf of the defendant, Judge Cook was amazed at the action of the jury in availing itself of the privilege of saving the wretch's neck, and took occasion to rebuke the jurors for their misguided leniency. The murderer's victim was a woman whom he shot without the slightest provocation, and as in all cases where proof of guilt is overwhelming, the insanity plea was interposed. In commenting on the verdict Judge Cook said that the circumstances of the case were such that, the jury having found the defendant responsible for his crime, there should have been no question as to the penalty that should be imposed. In his opinion the law could be vindicated only by the hanging of the murderer. It is the miscarriage of justice such as that which Judge Cook deprecated, combined with the maladministration of the law by negligent and corrupt officials, that is responsible for what might be termed, without exaggeration, the reign of terror which is alarming residents of this city today. Crimes resulting from violence are of daily occurrence, and scarcely a week passes without the killing of some human being to contribute to the sensationalism of the daily papers. No such reckless disregard of the law is to be observed in any other city in the world. The reason for this shocking state of affairs is not hard to divine—hanging bees are too few and far between. The shedding of human blood with malice aforethought no longer involves serious risk. The consequences of a protracted season of political demoralization are now being felt. Life and property are far less secure in this city today than they were in the period that immediately preceded the organization of the original Vigilantes. This statement will be received with incredulity by those whose time is absorbed by the various activities, but it is easy of verification. Corroboration may be found in the records of the morgue and the criminal courts. The slightest brawl nowadays culminates in an attempt to end human life. As soon as an arrest is made, the potent pull is invoked, and even before the machinery of the law is set in motion plans for the thwarting of justice have been matured. The case is juggled from the very beginning, and even though the defendant is convicted it is more than likely that the record will reach the Supreme Court in such shape that a new trial becomes a certainty. By the time the second trial is held the principal witnesses have disappeared, and if ever the prisoner does go to the penitentiary it is for such a short period that he has reason to feel that he escaped punishment. So infrequently is the law vindicated that people of vicious tendencies are becoming more rampant every day. It is becoming dangerous to resent an insult with a frown. The leniency of juries is responsible for much of the lawlessness that exists, but nothing short of an aroused public sentiment will revolutionize the administration of justice in this city, and bring about that security to life and property which is the boast of all civilized communities.

The Way of the Press

De mortuis nil nisi bonum is a maxim whose observance is highly creditable when it is construed to mean that you should not speak ill of the dead, but when it is accepted literally to serve as a pretext for lavish praise of notoriously corrupt and vicious individuals, the effect is decidedly demoralizing. It is generally conceded by the press of this city that the public conscience needs awakening, and though the dailies cry out periodically against corruption they are more responsible than any other single influence for the indifference to the unwholesome conditions that prevail. This community is afflicted with a degenerate and hypocritical press which hasn't the grace to conceal its own duplicity. What could be more significant of the atrophied morals of the press than the effrontery of one of our leading dailies in devoting columns of its space to extravagant laudation of a man who, in consequences of his political practices, was once a fugitive from justice, and who was notoriously a dangerous and corrupting influence in the State for a quarter of a century? Did the author of the old Latin maxim ever imagine that it could be tortured into a pretext for thus proclaiming that success in roguery justifies a eulogistic obituary notice? What greater menace to the morals of a community could be imagined than a newspaper that would boldly and defiantly undertake to pedestal for public admiration the lifeless figure of a man who, during his active career, was the incarnation of all the vices that are popularly believed to threaten the stability of the government! We have always believed that the old Latin maxim was intended to discourage people from slandering the dead, but the modern moulder of public opinion is most charitably liberal in its construction. Even while attesting its virtuous indignation against corruption in politics by inveighing on one page against Abe Ruef for daring to aspire to a seat in the Senate, on another it commends his prototype to public esteem. A few weeks ago this same virtuous and charitable organ of public opinion scored one of its contemporaries for daring to represent the unspeakable Ruef as a man of praiseworthy parts, but obviously if Mr. Ruef desires the esteem of the journal in which he has been frequently and bitterly denounced, he has but to shuffle off his mortal coil and, presto! his contemporaries will learn that he was a man of noble character who devoted a lifetime to the improvement and elevation of the municipal government. And by such journalistic tactics is the public conscience being trained with a view to the propagation of high ideals.

Simian Worship

Some people, blessed with more of this world's goods than they can make use of, recently paid three thousand dollars for a young gorilla, which they are bringing up as if it were a child and lavishing all the care and affection upon the animal which could be bestowed on a human being. A foolish woman followed up this freak by expending fifteen hundred dollars on a diamond collar for her dog, and the two incidents form a theme for philanthropists to dilate upon. "Kissing goes by favor," and if people of means prefer to lavish their wealth upon dogs and monkeys there is no law to compel them to adopt children or endow orphan asylums. Notoriety is the breath of their nostrils and the smart set will continue to exhibit such freaks of perverted intellect as long as yellow journals will exploit them, albeit the pretence is to deplore and decry. But there is no reason to regret that the dog and monkey worshipers have not adopted babies, for it is notorious that the women who devote themselves to animals are rarely tolerant, much less kind or affectionate to children. Even their own babies, when there are any unfortunate enough to be born to them, are set aside for the dog or the parrot, and the thoughtless infants will be severely punished for shortcomings not reproved in the animals. If uncertain little feet turn up the corner of a rug, or a chair is pushed out of place, there is a sharp reprimand, and moist little fingers are not tolerated in contact where the dog's feet and muzzle may intrude unchallenged. Women will drag a little child by the arms, never dreaming of regulating their giant strides to its tiny steps. They will hurry past the attractive shop windows and be deaf to the sights and sounds so alluring to infant senses, but when it is the dog that goes for a walk it is another matter. There is no haste then, and no sharp jerking on the leash. There is no danger that the canine will be checked short, raising its forefeet off the ground, and if it runs through a crowd, tripping pedestrians and upsetting go-carts with their occupants, there is never a sharp word or a gesture of impatience. Doggie's comfort is always looked after, and though baby may be kept out of sight in a back nursery, doggie has his silken cushion at the drawing-room fireside or the front window. Three thousand dollars would furnish endless comfort for a child, but not under the same roof with the people who spent it for the monkey.

Drastic Immigration Bill

Another bill to restrict immigration, far more drastic than the act approved last March, has been introduced in the Senate by Mr. Lodge. It denies admission to "all persons over fifteen years of age and physically capable of reading who cannot read the English language or some other language." An exception is made of the wives and children of immigrants already settled here. The test of literacy is to be extracted from the Constitution of from twenty to twenty-five words printed in the various languages of the immigrants. Those who cannot stand the test are to be returned at the expense of the transportation company which brought them. A bill directed against the same class of immigrants passed the House of Representatives in 1896 by a large majority, and in the next year it went through the Senate. President Cleveland vetoed it on the ground that it was "a radical departure from our national policy relating to immigration" and because its provisions were "unnecessarily harsh and oppressive." He said that "the ability to read and write affords a misleading test of contented industry and supplies unsatisfactory evidence of desirable citizenship or a proper apprehension of the benefits of our institutions." The House passed the bill over the President's veto, but it failed in the Senate. In view of the fact that Senator Lodge has fathered the new measure, it will no doubt be approved by the President in the event of its passage. If it should be passed it would exclude a large part of the immigrants who are coming to this country from eastern and southern Europe, for it is among them that illiteracy is especially prevalent.

When Watterson Declined a Legacy

That gallant old war-horse of Democracy, Colonel Henry Watterson, of the dark and bloody battleground, has been provoked into a statement of what he did in a situation similar to that in which William Jennings Bryan found himself when engaged in the execution of the will of Philo S. Bennett. Bryan's course in accepting a legacy under a will of his own execution has caused a deal of newspaper discussion and among those who denounced the Nebraska statesman was Henry Watterson. He remarked that "if there is something noble in the rejection of money one has not earned or inherited in the regular order, there must be something ignoble in accepting it." Thereupon the Salt Lake Herald said: "We cannot help wondering if the editor of the Courier-Journal, himself a public man of almost as much prominence as Mr. Bryan, would not, under the same circumstances, do exactly as Mr. Bryan is doing."

The Kentucky colonel was not slow to make reply. Here it is:

The late Mr. Tilden desired to make the editor of the Courier-Journal a legatee in his will, and, though the benefaction was urged upon him, he gratefully, but firmly, declined to permit it to be done. Mr. Bryan himself wrote the Bennett will. It was written, not in Connecticut, where Mr. Bennett lived, but away out in Lincoln, Neb., under Mr. Bryan's own roof. Contested by the widow of Mr. Bennett, Mr. Bryan is contesting it in the courts. What boots it that he says he will donate the money to public uses?

As a man of fine ethical principles Mr. Bryan erred in accepting that legacy. There are many lawyers who have never boasted of a scrupulous regard for the proprieties, who would scorn to write themselves down a legatee under the will of a client.

Mutual Criticism Clubs

The latest wrinkle in clubdom is the mutual criticism club, in which the members are to give each other the benefit of their opinions, and all is to be sisterly love and charity. As far as heard from, this organization is still to be, but there does not seem to be any reason why a special club need be formed for the purpose since every organization of women, from the village sewing circle to the one for the discussion of the most highly ethereal ized and attenuated subdivision of esthetic ideas is, after all, only a mutual criticism and gossip society. Of course ladies who wear silk frocks and diamonds do not gossip. They only tell each other the news. And they do not criticise each other, but each one feels that she has an inherent right to seek sympathy for her grievances. But in the end, it is all one. Two cronies exchanging "she sez" over the back fence on wash day may not be so pleasing a sight to the observer as well-dressed dowagers seated in the arm-chairs of the drawing-room and comparing notes on what "I have heard hinted," but the effect is not different. We have a local club whose membership is composed of the haut ton, and if any one were to hint that the ladies were given to gossiping or backbiting, or exchanging personal criticisms, social war would be declared, yet in a catalogue in which this particular club and its performances is listed the record discloses "quarrel," "dissension," "fracas," "misunderstanding," "trouble," "gossip," and all the other euphemisms and synonyms which might be summed up as rows. One of the beauties of women's club fracases is that the disputants never stick to the subject under discussion. A decision as to who has a right to the floor is pretty sure to bring in allusions to personal appearances, household economy, the manners of the children, the husband's business standing and the social position of the ancestry on both sides. The awarding of a prize for a patch quilt at a country fair has been known to affect the election of the next state governor and break up a school district, and—"Tell it not in Gath, whisper it not in Ascalon"—there have been times when a plentiful supply of courtplaster was needed to heal wounds not of the spirit, and the friendly mantle of darkness has facilitated the home-going from an animated session of a mutual criticism club. No doubt the organizations are, as the despatches state, "popular, desirable and profitable," but they are a long way from being a novelty.

The Artificial Complexion

Since the days of '49 the women of San Francisco have had a reputation for "made-up" faces, as well as for beautiful complexions. The climate is popularly believed to be conducive to beautiful flesh tints, but there have always been women in San Francisco, even among the haut ton, who were not satisfied with what nature did for them. Some years ago there was such a strong prejudice against the artificial complexion that for awhile rouge was tabu except in certain circles, but since the Sunday supps began exploiting the secrets of the toilet the old practice of "touching up" has been revived, and nowadays the paint-bedaubed female is becoming conspicuous. It seems, too, that many pretty women are growing careless as the winter days grow shorter. Some of our most fashionable maids and matrons are to be seen with dabs of rouge on their cheeks, smears of black on their palpably lengthened eyebrows, and other first aids to beauty not by the cunning hand of nature laid on. From time immemorial women have made up, and they will do so to the end of time. There is nothing especially reprehensible in the practice if the "touching up" is done with artistic hand, but the inartistic "make-up" is disgusting. One rarely sees an actress off duty with a "laid-on" complexion. Why? Because if she resorts to artificial aid she does so in the light in which she is to be viewed. Most women put on their complexions in softly curtained boudoirs. Moreover, the non-professional woman does not make a proper study of the art. She disclaims all knowledge of such things, and pretends to be uninterested, while actresses seek pointers from one another, and instead of using old-fashioned beautifiers, investigate and experiment with all sorts of pastes, unguents and pigments. They frankly exchange ideas upon the art of making up, and take a pride in possessing and propagating beauty secrets. They are so cautious that they do not use for private life, and for sunlight, close inspection, the same materials that are employed on the stage, but the society grand dame goes about looking ridiculous, in a complexion the components of which were recommended by some "How-to-be-Beautiful" Sunday supp writer, and imagines that she has acquired the art of concealing art. Many stage women never "make up" off the stage, and they retain their youthful complexions because they are careful to use only the purest of ingredients in the materials required to enhance their appearance before the footlights. Old Ovid, who came into the world to view fair faces as long ago as forty-three B. C., recognized the need and recommended the means of judicious beautifying. Hearken, fair, heedless ones of nineteen hundred and three A. D.:

You know the use of white to make you fair,
And how with red, lost color to repair;
Imperfect eyebrows you by art can mend,
And skin when wanting o'er a scar extend;
Nor need the fair one be ashamed, who tries
To add new lustre to her eyes.
But still beware that from your lover's eye
You keep conceal'd the med'cines you apply.
Tho' art assists, yet must that art be hid,
Lest whom it would invite it should forbid.
Who would not take offense to see a face
All daub'd and dripping with the melted grease?
And tho' your unguents bear th' Athenian name
The wood's unsavory scent is still the same.

The Confederate Viewpoint

[W. W. Foote, an ex-Confederate soldier, delivered an oration on November twenty-eighth before "Pap" Price Camp, Confederate Veterans, at Colusa. The following are extracts from his address.]

The fact that many of the greatest Southern leaders were educated at West Point and Annapolis, and resigned to enter the service of the Confederacy, has frequently been the reason given for denouncing them as traitors. The people who apply these epithets seem to forget that the South paid its share of the taxes which went to maintain these institutions, and were entitled to send their sons in proportion to their Congressional representation.

The charge that Lee, Jackson, the Johnstons, Beauregard, Hood, and others, were traitors, is usually made by the hired emissaries who came from Europe during the war, attracted by the high bounties paid for substitutes, and the alluring hope of pensions to come.

I have often visited a little Episcopal church in Alexandria, Virginia, since the conclusion of the war. In the church-yard there is an imposing monument to the memory of the unknown Confederate dead. Around this monument are the graves of many soldiers who served in the Revolutionary war.

Upon entering this little church and proceeding up the left-hand aisle, and just before you reach the altar, on the right, is a pew, fitted up as it was more than a century ago, and on this pew is a modest little sign, bearing the name, "George Washington," who was one of the vestrymen, until the day of his death. Directly across the aisle is another pew the same size and appointments as that of Washington, and it also bears a great and historic name, not second even to that of the father of his country—R. E. Lee, who was likewise a vestryman. Doubtless the spirits of these two great soldiers and patriots are in close communion in the Heavenly realms above, attended by the heroic Stonewall Jackson, and the knightly J. E. B. Stuart, and others, who have with them "crossed the river, to lie down under the shade of the trees."

But an enduring earthly monument will soon be erected to Washington and Lee. The Congress of the United States has established a Hall of Fame, in which are to be placed the statues of two citizens of each State, selected by the States themselves, from the names of their two most distinguished deceased citizens.

Virginia has unanimously selected George Washington and Robert E. Lee. She could have made no other that would not have violated the feelings of her citizens. When Washington and Lee, in marble or bronze, are placed in the Hall of Fame, at the National Capitol, the State of Virginia can point with becoming pride to her selection, and in a spirit of friendly rivalry challenge any of her sister Commonwealths to point to their equals.

Washington is universally conceded to be as pure a patriot as ever shed lustre upon his country. yet the others have been denounced by flippant orators and malicious partisans, as traitors to their country.

As a Southern soldier and a lover of my whole country, I resent the charge, and I doubt not that I express your sentiments as well as my own, when I say, in the language of the brilliant Patrick Henry: "If this be treason, make the most of it." * * *

It is perhaps useless to speculate upon what would have been the result of the contest had certain things happened differently.

Had it not been for the untimely death of Albert Sidney Johnston at the battle of Shiloh, or Pittsburg Landing, the armies of Grant and Sherman would have been captured, or drowned in the Tennessee river. Johnston was wounded late in the afternoon, but refused to dismount, as the enemy were in full flight, and completely demoralized. General Johnston bled to death, and the command of the Confederate armies fell to General Beauregard, who was ill and giving his orders from a litter. He discontinued the attack and pursuit, and during the night the fresh troops of General Buell crossed the river, whereupon General Beauregard slowly fell back towards Corinth.

Again, had Pickett's charge at Gettysburg been successful, and it only failed through a blunder, the army of General Meade would have been destroyed, thus enabling Lee to capture Philadelphia, New York, and overrun the North. The happening of either one of these events would have secured the independence of the Confederate States.

At the time we looked upon these failures as great misfortunes—but looking back forty years, it would seem that perhaps things were ordered for the best. If this Nation could be governed in the future for the whole people, certainly the failure to secure our independence may have been a blessing in disguise.

There is no candid man of any party, or from any section, who does not now concede that the Amendment passed, which conferred upon the recently emancipated slaves the right to vote, was a political mistake, if not a political crime—it was a gross injustice upon the white race of the South, and the worst thing which could possibly have happened to the Negro race.

It created a political storm; the cloud was first no bigger than a man's hand, but now it covers and blackens the whole political horizon, and threatens to break and destroy our great system of government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

The wisest and most conservative statesmanship is required at this time, to repair the grave blunders made immediately succeeding the war, and made for the sole purpose of punishing and humiliating the South.

That great statesman, Jefferson Davis, at the conclusion of his book, gives this advice, and it will be well if we should follow it:

"Much of the past is irremediable; the best hope for a restoration in the future to the pristine purity and fraternity of the Union, rests on the opinions and character of the men who are to succeed this generation; that they may be suited to that blessed work, one whose public course is ended, invokes them to draw their creed from the fountains of our political history, rather than from the lower stream, polluted as it has been by self-seeking place-hunters and by sectional strife."

But self-praise is vainglorious, and I shall simply say that the virtues of our Southern people are beginning to be acknowledged by those who were earlier our foes and detractors. * * *

But you and I, fellow comrades, owe a duty to ourselves and to our country, to our children and our children's children, which we should sacredly perform. We should teach our children that their fathers were descendants of the all-conquering, ever-dominant, and properly proud Anglo-Saxon race; we should teach them that their fathers fought for a cause, and a principle, which is sacred to them; we should teach them that patriotism and love of country are still among the cardinal virtues to be cultivated, and that the acquisition of money, and the vulgar display of finery, are not the only things worth living for in this modern day and generation.

And we should especially guard our children against imbibing the insidious poison contained in modern school books, which are filled with perverted facts, and teeming with sectional hate.

Before finally closing I have only another word to say. Some twenty-five years ago I visited Mount Vernon and the city of Alexandria. At the little church before alluded to they were making some repairs, which required the removal of one of the locust rafters. The sexton, a venerable man, informed me that he had refused to have this rafter made up into souvenirs, for fear that frauds might be committed; but he afterwards had made for me two small cups, which he presented to me, partly because he had learned that I was an ex-Confederate soldier residing in California, but mainly for the reason that our conversation had disclosed that we were slightly related.

One of these cups I have had lined with silver, and I think, appropriately inscribed, as a gift from myself to Pap Price Camp. I hope that you will appreciate the gift as much as I enjoy being able to make the donation.

And now, fellow comrades, let me enjoin you to let all the ends thou aimest at be thy God's, thy Country's and Truth's, and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man.

Trusting I have not wholly disappointed your anticipations, I thank you most sincerely for your attention, and bid you a sincere farewell.

Self Esteem

BY HARRY COWELL

The greatest of wits is not half so interesting to the dullest of mortals as is the dullest of mortals to himself. To myself I am the most fascinating of all subjects, to yourself, you are. A man desires of the society of others in order the better to enjoy his own incomparable company. He is never, assertions to the contrary notwithstanding, tired of himself. For others to have modest opinions of themselves is a virtue, because in proportion as they abase themselves he is exalted. Agree frankly and fully with the next person who speaks disparagingly of himself in your presence, and note his expression. Fail to contradict the artist who is showing you the imperfections of his masterpiece, and on the morrow try to borrow five dollars of him, and fail. When people praise me or my work, it is my invariable habit to yield them immediate and hearty assent. I never could for an immodest moment dream of being so self-assertive as to differ from critics of such exceptionally good taste. But the result is truly remarkable. As the phrase is, it should be seen to be appreciated.

"You dance divinely," said a divinity to me once.

"I do," said I simply. What else could one say under the circumstances? "That's so," would have lacked elegance; "I am precisely of your opinion" would have sounded pedantic in a ball-room; "thou sayest sooth" is obsolete. To this day even it still seems to me that "I do" was as good a way of expressing agreement as any. But, would you believe it? the divinity aforesaid regarded me with amazement—looked as though she had expected immediate and hearty dissent.

The man who has a good opinion of himself makes certain of being well thought of by at least one not altogether unimportant person. Think how it might be with him—but no, that would be too dreadful. The great, almost without exception, esteem themselves highly; and the great are ever being held up to us as examples. Back of the obnoxious practice of "knocking," so prevalent among artists, is self-love.

To reduce self-abasement to absurdity is not difficult.

"Did you ever see such an idiot as I am in all your born days?"

Never, my dear sir, or madam, as the case may be.

When a man, about to make a speech, or give other public demonstration of his superiority over his fellows, begins by saying deprecatory things of his ability—things that he would resent to the day of his death, if said by another—he, by so doing, lowers the expectancy of his audience. The result is that the performance, if up to the average, is accounted remarkable. The reason why so many famous speakers, actors, singers, etc., prove such bitter disappointments is not far to seek. We go with expectations beyond the reach even of the loftiest genius. Discrepancy between the actual and the ideal is inevitable, and the end is disenchantment.

To the cultured ear of this generation, the word Heredity comes with awful significance. The irresistible, inexplicable power of this most terrible of the fates has been exploited with marked effect by modern writers, Ibsen, for illustrious example. On the other hand, we have Environment, a power of not less repute. Grant Allen's "What's Bred in the Bone" is offset by Walter Besant's "The Children of Gideon." More than one thinker has come to regard the strutting of man across the stage of life as the mere resultant of these two great forces, Heredity and Environment.

Now patriotism (which is for the most part but extended egotism, enlarged good opinion of one's self) requires you to say that your country is the best in the world, and the form of it known as "local," that you live in the best part of the best country in the world. So much for environment. Then filial affection requires you to say that your father is the best man and your mother the best woman in the best place in the best country in the world. So much for heredity and environment combined. But modesty requires you to say that you, the product of the best possible environment and the best possible heredity, are after all but a worm i' the dust and unworthy the name of man. Q. E. D.

Modest reader, you humbly beg to differ with me; but, mark you, in so doing, you assume that your judgment is juster than mine. If you held that my judgment was the juster, you would accept it. Between us should be no difference of opinion whatever. No matter how great a man may be, if on any subject you are not of one mind with him, the inevitable inference is that your opinion is in some way superior to his. And, my humble sir or madam, should I question you closely, and you answer me truly, I could demonstrate the startling fact that you have the audacity to differ with some sainted master-mind in almost every one of your opinions. If, for instance, you hold that the effects of use and disuse are not inherited, you put your opinion above that of the great Herbert Spencer, who has spent a lifetime in the study of biology and kindred matters. Are you of Christian persuasion, a Protestant, say? Think of the giant intellects among the Jews with whom you take it upon yourself to disagree! Think of Cardinal Newman! Nor will it help you in the least, Sir or Lady Humility, to be Jew or Roman Catholic. They of contrary or contradictory religious views are not all of them fools by any means.

Nothing less than the force of logic could have induced me personally to fall back on self-esteem. But when it came to thinking well of myself or else appearing unreasonable I chose the former.

I have heard men much bepraised because they were gentle in their judgments of others and severe in dealing with themselves. Out upon such, I say, for an unchristian and boorish lot. My practice is much more commendable. When I happen to tread upon the toes of my conscience, I hasten to say in my best Beau-Brummel manner, "Pardon me, dear Coward-maker." "Pray don't mention it," is the polite rejoinder; "I have no—ahem—corns." In brief, my conscience and I live together in Christian unity. Seriously, this hateful falling out with such a good fellow as one's self for faults pardonable in others is the last infirmity of noble minds.

The Saunterer

The McClung Tragedy

The motif of the Palace Hotel tragedy is the subject of a great deal of speculation. The people directly involved desire the public to believe that the tragedy had none of the morbid or romantic elements that are usually associated with the killing of a man in the private apartments of a woman, but the skeptical are inclined to give their imagination rein, while seeking to penetrate the veil of secrecy which was so quickly drawn after the fatal bullet sped into the body of Major McClung. The eagerness of the dramatis personae to avoid the calcium rays, and the nonchalance of the murderer, his confidence that he will not be prosecuted, and his ominous hint that if the charge against him were pressed, "all the facts would come out," are circumstances that tend to stimulate curiosity. It is said that Alexander Garnett was crazed with drink when he invaded Mrs. Coit's apartments. His conduct immediately subsequent to the shooting is not suggestive of a mind saturated with alcohol. His promptness in summoning a physician, in seeking seclusion, and in recovering from the effects of a debauch, rather belie the statement that he was crazed with drink when he did the shooting. Moreover there are many significant discrepancies in the statements made by the people involved in the scandal. Mrs. Coit was quoted as saying that Major McClung visited her to convey a message from his wife. Garnett said that McClung called on Mrs. Coit to straighten out his (Garnett's) trouble which grew out of a game of bridge-whist.

The Neilson Scandal

Mrs. Lillie Coit is not of the age at which women figure in tragedies spiced with romance. But she is of the type that in all periods of the world's history has fomented the passions of men. In the early fifties she was an unconventional school girl, and her pranks excited a great deal of amusement. She attended a public school in Washington street on what subsequently became the site of the First Baptist church. Ellis H. Holmes was the principal and he was also a teacher. She was afterward a pupil in the High School in Powell street which is now the Normal School. When she made up her mind to marry Howard Coit, son of Dr. Coit, efforts were made to prevent the match. Coit's parents objected, but the young people were married secretly. Then they separated, Coit starting for the East, but her parents learned of the marriage, and she wired a characteristic message to her husband: "It's all out—hell's to pay. Come back." The marriage proved an unhappy one because of Coit's penchant for flirtations. The most notable instance of his truancy was brought to light one day when Mrs. Coit surprised him in the company of Adelaide Neilson who was filling a professional engagement in this city. I believe Mrs. Coit interrupted a very warm love scene. At any rate there was quite a scandal over the affair, and the newspapers gave it wide publicity.

Some Big Gambling Games

The moralists will no doubt point to the McClung tragedy as a warning against gambling among women. Mrs. Coit says that her trouble with Garnett grew out of a bridge-whist game, but she has not gone into the details. It has been generally known for years that both Mrs. Coit and her mother were inveterate card players, and many stories have been circulated about games for big stakes that were pulled off in their apartments. Naturally she will be reluctant to go into court, and submit to a cross-examination about the game in which Garnett is said to have lost his head. Indeed the indications are that unless the authorities take the necessary precautions they will not have any witnesses when the case comes to trial.

Family Pedigree

Mrs. McClung is constantly being referred to as the only daughter of Dr. R. Beverly Cole. She was not. Dr. Cole had two daughters, one of whom, Eugenia, became Mrs. Sielken. When "Billy" McClung won Josie Cole, the glad news went forth in the Southern set that he had captured the only heiress to Mrs. Cole's fortune, but it was a mistake. Though the Coles are always referred to as Southerners, that designation is somewhat inaccurate. Dr. Cole was a Virginian who was educated in Philadelphia. He there married the daughter of a Frenchman who had been in business in Philadelphia for many years. On the completion of the doctor's medical course, he came to California with his wife. Six children were born to them but only the two daughters have survived. They have lived here all their lives except when they were sojourning in Europe for a brief while. Major McClung was a gentleman who had always been noted for his courtesy and his gallantry, and his tragic end is sadly deplored by all who knew him.

The Ruef Hoax

The story that Abe Ruef has Senatorial aspirations, and that he is already perfecting plans to win the toga, is a hoax. Thrifty Abe has no desire to shift his sphere of operations. Not yet awhile. Abe will have money to throw at the birds at the end of the Schmitz Administration, and then perhaps the scented atmosphere of the halls of legislation may appeal to his sensitive olfactory nerves, but meanwhile the toga has no charms for him. The running of this wide-open town, at present, is more congenial to him than a cushioned seat in the Senate would be. He intends taking a hand in the Senatorial fight but not in his own behalf. He is open to an engagement as a manager, and when he appears at Sacramento at the next session of the legislature it will probably be as the representative of a gentleman who expects to spend about one hundred thousand dollars to secure a sufficient number of votes to entitle him to the Senatorship. Abe has capitalized his political prestige, and he is prepared to employ it to the greatest advantage to himself.

The Premature Reformer

Some people of envious nature who take themselves seriously have gathered the impression that Mr. Ruef is getting ready to take the lid off hell about the first of the year, and they are quietly agitating the advisability of doing something by way of circumvention. I have heard that about two score of prominent city men, including a few clergymen, have already held a few meetings to discuss ways and means of blocking a few of the channels through which, it has been reported, Mr. Ruef's fees as an attorney flow in a steady, glittering stream. Their purpose, I believe, is to organize another Civic Federation, but if they do so they are very likely to find that they are somewhat premature. The town is about as wide-open as ever it was, and vice is boisterously and unblushingly rampant, but the reformers have mistaken their cue. The reaction from the last reform crusade has not yet subsided. The professional reformer is not a highly esteemed personage in this community. His ululations can awaken no response among the wicked. He is regarded as a Pharisee. He must bide his time. Perhaps in 1904 he will not be unwelcome.

De Young Doesn't Want It

Mr. M. H. De Young returned home a few days ago, and learned upon his arrival that he was an aspirant for the Panama commissionership which is to be vouchsafed this coast. The interesting news amused the proprietor of the Chronicle. He says that he would not take the commissionership if it were offered to him. Dr. Rowell of Fresno hopes to be appointed Panama Commissioner, and Republican politicians think that he will achieve his ambition. He has the support of all the influential men in the party. Dr. Rowell is a wealthy physician who controls the political destinies of Fresno.

Exit Montague

Now that Postmaster Montague has resigned his office, there will no doubt be a great improvement in the postal service in this city. The new postmaster, Arthur Fisk, may be relied upon to give his personal attention to the business of the department, and to see that his subordinates do not avail themselves of their official position to promote their private enterprises. Fisk is an energetic young man, and during the last session of the legislature, in his capacity as Speaker of the Assembly, he rendered conspicuous service to the people of the State. He was appointed postmaster on the recommendation of Senator Perkins. The news of his appointment gave a thrill of joy to the numerous embryonic statesmen of the Fifth District, who are eager to go to Congress. It was conceded that Fisk could have the nomination next year, but now that he occupies a high Federal position the field is open.

The third entertainment of the Polyglot Club took place on Thanksgiving eve at the Arts and Crafts building. It was in effect a Dante evening, the piece de resistance being a lecture on the poet by Mr. L. D. Ventura. Mrs. E. Avery, Miss C. B. La Barraque and Professor R. A. Lucchesi sustained the musical portion of the program. The Polyglot is one of the most advanced of our local culture clubs, and always offers a program far beyond the average in excellence.

Our Star Literary Genius

Jack London, genius, social reformer, aged twenty-seven years or thereabouts, is as versatile as he is virile and prolific. Finding himself awhile back in England's metropolis, he followed the advice of Abraham Lincoln and took "a bath of the common man." Then, having washed him and made him clean, he sat down and wrote what he calls, with his fine instinct for names, "The People of the Abyss," a plain, unvarnished tale of the night side of a great city, a tale that finds the heart and keeps it. This makes the fifth volume of his the Macmillan Company has published within a twelvemonth. He is now engaged in writing a new work, "A Sea Wolf" the title, which will appear serially some time next spring in the Century magazine. After that, he will probably revisit Japan, modify, or rather mollify, his manner somewhat, and go by way of the Japanese short-story to the goal of his friends' ambition for him, the subtle, complex novel of modern civilized life. If the too Anglo Saxon Jack London is really desirous of reaching the "great American novel"—and no other writer is heading in that direction much faster than he—he should go by way of France.

The Divine Anna

Miss Anna Strunsky, the poet of the "Kempton-Wace Letters," who defended lyric love so lyrically against the biological onslaughts of the scientific Jack London, is home again in San Francisco from her trip to Europe, penning enthusiastically a novel with a purpose for the Macmillan Company. Miss Strunsky is of the land that produced Turgenev and Tolstoi, and of the race that produced the Book of Job and The Song of Songs; and one of the most delightful experiences of her visit abroad was her meeting with her countryman, the noble Prince Peter Krapotkin, humanitarian, scientist, lover of liberty, now living, an honored exile, in London, England. As to personality, Miss Strunsky is "personality" personified—nothing if not fascinating. The angel entrusted with the distributing of charm, that rare attar of roses grown in paradise, emptied a vialful, meant for a whole countryside, on the head of the young Russian, and the result is indescribable. Should she succeed in putting herself into the work, her book when opened ought, like a volume of Lamb's or of Stevenson's, to give forth a faint perfume as though flowers had been pressed between the pages. The novel is to be called—well, that would be telling, and I promised not to, and moreover the writer might change her mind and the title of her work and make me as one who says the thing that is not.

His Fiction Pays

When Frank Norris died everybody was commiserating the widow because she was left nothing except prospective royalties on her husband's books. But it now appears that these will aggregate quite a tidy little fortune. Mrs. Norris's last check from the publishers for royalties on "The Pit" alone amounted to fifteen thousand dollars, and she has had several other checks almost as large. She is investing most of the money in sugar stocks. Very soon she will be receiving large royalties from the dramatization of "The Pit," which is said to contain the elements of success. It is the prevailing opinion that the essays of Frank Norris should not have been published, for they have not enhanced his literary reputation. His style was not sufficiently polished for essay-writing. Nor will the short stories posthumously published add anything to his fame, but they do add to his widow's income and so she can scarcely be blamed for putting them on the market. She is by the way a very attractive young widow and she has been receiving much attention..

In Her Husband's Footsteps

The old story of Elijah's mantle was never better exemplified, by the way, than in Mrs. Norris's case. As Nettie Black, she was a handsome girl without the slightest pretense to literary attainment, but during the years of her married life she was so closely in touch with literary men and their methods that she is said to have acquired a pretty taste in literature, and she has gone East to accept a position which was recently offered to her as reader for McClure's. She rendered her husband valuable assistance in collecting material for "The Pit," his most successful book, for which he gave her credit in the preface, and it was on the strength of this that she received the offer from the magazine publishers.

Mr. and Mrs. Philip Verrill Mighels are settled in New York for the winter. Mr. Mighels has his literary workshop at 340 East Fifteenth street, and he is now busy correcting the proofs of a volume of short stories which Harper will issue in the spring.

"Mistress of Herself Though China Fall"

One of the drollest incidents that ever disturbed domestic harmony occurred the other day in the house of a man whose wife has a notoriously bad temper. One evening he brought home unexpected guests to dinner—always a hazardous thing to do—and though the wife received them with smiles there was an ominous glitter in her eye. Just after dinner the hostess was missed from the drawing-room and shortly afterward there was the sound of falling crockery—a sure sign that madame was giving her temper free rein. Whenever anything displeased her she soothed herself by throwing the crockery about the kitchen. When reproached afterward for this churlish conduct she always averred that she could not help it, and that she was heartily ashamed of herself. This evening, after the guests had gone and the wife was upstairs, she was startled to hear crashing dishes in the kitchen. Rushing down she found her husband throwing down the best cut glass in the house, and the floor was already covered with a thousand crystal fragments. With tears she begged him to desist. At first he would not, but he finally listened to her entreaties, after she had promised never to break any more dishes. The husband had noticed that she never broke anything but the commonest things and he thought a little breakage of her pet pieces would cure her. It did.

The Crack Matchmaker

Mrs. Salisbury has taken Angelo Conti under her wing and is piloting him socially. He is a handsome, young and clever Italian lawyer, but Mrs. Salisbury is interested in him principally because of his noble birth. He is the son of the Mayor of Turin. He is both witty and popular, and speaks English perfectly, but with a penchant for hand-holding that Mrs. Salisbury will no doubt discourage. His great friend here is Count Grimani who is also very popular, but who doesn't seem to care much for local society. He is the son of the Mayor of Venice. As Mrs. Salisbury always has a good supply of plain heiresses on hand she is in a fair way to make some good matches. Her latest protege is Christine Pomeroy, for whom she expects to accomplish great things. She has promised to make her the most successful debutante of the season. She certainly is the prettiest, having inherited the pulchritude of her mother, who by the way is almost as great a social general as Mrs. Salisbury.

"There's a woman who should have no difficulty in making her way to the top in society."

"What are her claims to social distinction?"

"She has none, but she belongs to the Alpine Club. Her most sensational climb was in the Himalayas."

Their Dainty Trousseaux

There is a report current in smart social circles that the lingerie of the trousseau of Mrs. Norris Davis was the most beautiful ever seen in this city. It consisted almost entirely of ribbons and lace. I hear that she never dared exhibit it to her mother-in-law, Mrs. Horace Davis, it was so dainty. Mrs. Davis mere has very New Englandish ideas, and there was a time when New Englanders regarded lace and ruffles on lingerie as immoral. While on the subject of lingerie, I am reminded that Miss Drown is preparing her trousseau and that it is of great beauty, including many hand-made and embroidered articles. Miss Kip's trousseau is said to be the richest that ever gladdened the heart of a local bride.

Will They Wed?

According to the latest record of the bavardes of the daily press, Miss Adelaide Deming is going to New York to reside permanently. Nothing is said as to whether her marriage with Robert Mein of Oakland will take place before her departure, though it was to have been one of this winter's events. As both Miss Deming and Mr. Mein are record-breakers in the matter of broken engagements, it has been suggested that this move of Miss Deming's may be merely a preliminary to another step of that nature. When her twin sister wedded the actor, Harry Corson Clarke, it was understood that Addie would shortly after become the bride of a naval officer whose acquaintance she had made during a trip to Honolulu with the Frawleys. Then Mr. Groom—the same Groom who married pretty Gracie Shain—was reported to have been captivated by Miss Deming. After Gracie divorced him the gossips said perhaps Miss Deming would reconsider her old refusal. But she did not. Instead, she announced her engagement with a wealthy New Yorker, whom she didn't marry.

Is She—Are They?

Not long ago it was said that Charles Rollo Peters was engaged to a rich widow he had met in Washington, D. C., but now they say he is going to marry Vesta Shortridge. Nobody knows whether there is any truth in the story, but it is being hawked about by the gossips. Miss Shortridge and Mr. Peters became quite good friends when they were both staying at Monterey, and they have many tastes in common. It was a mutual love of literature and music that brought about Miss Shortridge's engagement with Emile Bruguiere, and a mutual love of art might naturally have cemented a friendship between Miss Shortridge and Mr. Peters. The artist is not so impressive looking as the society man who writes songs and comic operas, but he is a very clever and delightful companion. Besides, he is not bald, and Emile Bruguiere is very much so. Mr. Peters is a widower.

An "Old Holland" Party

A very original and delightful function was the "Dutch" party given by Mrs. Thomas Kirkpatrick last Tuesday afternoon. The Old Holland games that were played were very amusing, and the prizes, handsome steins, were in harmony with the general scheme of the affair. The table was artistically decorated in the Old Delft that Mrs. Kirkpatrick collected when abroad. The guests were Mesdames Goodall, Munger, Jones, Cox, Shipley, Wood, Partridge, Tobin, J. Kirkpatrick, Hall, Mead, Yates and Sorrenson, Misses Roberts, Eleanor and Maude Tobin.

Getting Into Society

Among the new people who have received the brand of the elect are the Alexander Wilsons, who made a large fortune in the restaurant business in this city. They have been out of trade for some time and have traveled extensively in Europe. The daughters have been educated in fashionable Boston schools, and they are possessed of many graces of mind and person that render them exceptionally attractive. But above all they have lots of shekels, and are therefore bound to cut a swath. Whenever local society is threatened with the acquisition of new recruits there is always talk of "drawing the line," especially among match-making mammas who feel that their attractive daughters are about to have their chances reduced. As a rule the dissent is expressed by those whose position is somewhat insecure and who need a great deal of boosting. Local society would be in a bad way if people were barred on account of the character of the business in which their wealth was founded. Some of our aristocrats are not yet free from the odor of whisky retailed by recent progenitors, and I believe it is said of the founder of the Parrott fortune that he debated for a long time whether he should establish a pawnshop or a bank.

Lawyers We Read About

Frequently have I marveled at the tolerance of the local bar in the matter of the shameless tactics of indecent practitioners, but I must confess that it is no more discreditable than that of the profession in New York toward the thrifty team of Howe & Hummel. The brazen effrontery of that brace of spectacular practitioners is unparalleled in the legal profession of any other city on this continent. If Howe and Hummel were in this city they would rank little higher than Police Court practitioners, but in New York they do a tremendous business, and as most of their clients are in the theatrical profession they receive a great deal of advertising, for litigation involving thespians or their managers generally makes good "copy" for the newspapers. The names of Howe and Hummel appear in the newspapers so frequently as to give the impression that they are the most distinguished lawyers of the New York bar. They undoubtedly do a big business, but they do not handle any litigation that involves complex law problems.

Spectacular Brutality

Two shining examples of the methods employed by Howe & Hummel to advertise themselves were given last week. One night a process server in their employ entered a theatre in which Mrs. Leslie Carter was playing "Zaza," walked into a proscenium box and stepped across the footlights just as the actress was about to speak the opening lines of the dressing-room scene in the first act. He interrupted the performance long enough to serve the actress with a paper in an injunction suit, and before the audience recovered from its amazement he re-entered the box and dashed out of the theatre. His conduct was approved by Howe and Hummel. A few days later another one of their process-servers obtained admission to the home of Mrs. Mary J. C. Culver, eldest daughter of United States Senator William A. Clark, by representing that he was employed by her attorney. She was holding a reception at the time, and he appeared among her guests and served her with papers in a suit brought against her by a Mrs. Elizabeth Vlasto for alienating the affections of her husband. Both brutal performances were characteristic of the men by whom they were dictated. In each instance the victim was prostrated. Mrs. Carter received such a shock that she was scarcely able to continue her performance.

Her Sensational Suit

The suit against Mrs. Culver, by the way, smacks somewhat of blackmail. Mrs. Vlasto has not lived with her husband for ten years, and she has steadfastly resisted his efforts for divorce. As Mrs. Culver is suing her husband for divorce the suit was probably intended to convey the impression that she contemplated marrying Vlasto. The latter was an intimate friend of her husband. He is fifty years old and has been in this country about thirty years. He was formerly an importer of brimstone and coffee. He was married twenty-eight years ago, and has a son, who is a conductor on a western railroad. The plaintiff demands five hundred thousand dollars damages. She alleges that Mrs. Culver and Vlasto have spent much time together abroad, in France and Switzerland, and she is said to have a photograph of the two taken in Europe.

The Amicable Vlasto

Vlasto, by the way, is not unknown in this city. He has been a friend of Senator Clark's family for years. He is what is known in society as a graceful dinner guest, because he is an amiable fellow, a good talker and a good story teller. The Clarks have used him for social function purposes, and of course he was always ready to accept their bountiful hospitality. That his personality was sufficiently engaging to win the affections of the multi-millionaire's daughter I seriously doubt. I believe he is older than Senator Clark. From friends of the Clarks I learn that it is suspected that Mrs. Vlasto was prompted to institute the suit by a New York newspaper against which Vlasto instituted a suit for libel some time ago. The supposition is that the paper expects to force a compromise.

There will be pretty things on sale, particularly dolls which Miss Mabel Coxe and others have dressed. The Spirit of Rivalry

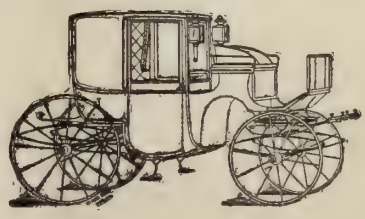
The Family Club gave a farewell dinner Saturday night to Paymaster Stanton of the Navy and the Bohemian Club gave one to Amadee Joullin. The Family is an offshoot of the Bohemian Club, and though it affects an ultra-democratic air by way of accentuation of its bohemianism, it sternly resents any imputation of rivalry. Nevertheless members of the Bohemian Club are convinced that the men of the Family put in most of their time knocking the older institution on the score of the dominance of the commercial element in what was once a bohemian club in spirit as well as in name. There are some clever wits in the Family Club and they have a cynical way of jesting about all mundane affairs, including the club over which that up-to-date type of bohemian, James D. Phelan, presides. And as a consequence, whenever a mot that is in the nature of a smash at the Bohemian Club is quoted within the portals of that institution, it is at once surmised that it emanated from the Family. The Hale brothers, drygoods merchants, are members of the Bohemian Club, and they have lately been referred to as "Hale Brothers, well met." The Family has been charged with having invented the designation; also with having referred to Raphael Weill as "Riff-raff Weill."

An Army Officer in Trouble

Paymaster Stanton had rather an embarrassing experience at the races the other day. He went over to the track to while away a little time, and to impart a little excitement to his visit, placed a small bet. He received a ten-dollar piece in change from the book-maker with whom he made the bet, and a few minutes later, receiving a suggestion from a tout, decided to hazard the ten dollars on a sure winner. Stepping up to another book-maker he handed him the ten-dollar piece that he had received in the betting ring, and the man scrutinized the money suspiciously, and then summoned a Pinkerton detective who placed the Paymaster under arrest for uttering counterfeit coin. It was some minutes before Stanton succeeded in convincing the detective that he was an army officer and not a counterfeiter, and a little later the book-maker discovered that he was mistaken. The coin was not a counterfeit. He searched for Stanton to return the money but the latter had left the track.

The Banshee



Mr. W. B. Yeats, the poet and dramatist, who is coming to this city as the guest of Mr. James D. Phelan, to tell us something about the Gaelic revival, was asked at one of his lectures the other night if there were any more banshees left in Ireland. He looked puzzled and declared that he didn't know what his questioner was "driving at." If Mr. Yeats pleads such ignorance in this city some of our Irish residents will suspect him of being a faker and doubt that he was ever in Ireland. Every Irishman knows that the banshee abounds in Ireland where it has always been indigenous to the soil. Irishmen are as familiar with the banshee as they are with the Big Wind. However, Mr. Yeats is not so ignorant as he pretends. In his "Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry" he writes: "In Ireland they (fairies) are still extant, giving gifts to the kindly and plaguing the surly. 'Have you ever seen a fairy or such like?' I asked an old man in county Sligo. 'Amn't I annoyed with them?' was the answer." In a note on "Omens" Mr. Yeats remarks, "We have other omens besides the banshee and the dullahan and the coach-o-bower. I know one family where death is announced by the cracking of a whip." The Gaelic revival would be uninteresting were it not for the banshees, the fairies and the omens that have imparted spirit to Celtic romance. If Mr. Phelan were as rich in Ireland as he is in this country a banshee would be one of the family entourage. It takes a rich family to sport a banshee.

They will visit Washington and New York, returning in about one month. During his stay in Washington Judge Morrow will do a little active work for the bill for the purchase of the Calaveras Big Trees, a matter in which he is deeply interested, and which is being agitated by the women of the Outdoor Art League.

The Three Handsome Shiels Women

The three Shiels brothers have married three very handsome women, each of a distinct type. The three beauties ought to be painted together to show the excellent taste of the brothers. The newest Mrs. Shiels, formerly Miss Elsie Bennett, is the handsomest of three. She is of French extraction and has a face like a cameo, with a pure Greek profile, exquisitely dainty coloring, violet eyes and dark brown hair, with a pink and white skin. Mrs. Jack Shiels was a Scotch girl whom the doctor met while he was a student at Edinburgh. It was a runaway match and Mrs. Shiels, like most poor girls who marry money, is one of the most extravagant women in San Francisco. At the confectioner's, the caterer's, the modiste's and the florist's she runs enormous bills and the Shiels establishment is expensive in other ways, as they have a flock of children.

A New Type

With the introduction of Miss Lulu Bothin comes a new type not of the Gibson girl variety. She is more of the Christy ideal, and yet possesses a marked individuality. She is tall, blonde and slender. She made her formal debut at the Mau tea, and her numerous relatives promise the young debutante a rose-colored future. It is whispered that the Whittier mansion is to be thrown open in her honor, and if rumor speaks truly, prodigal hospitality may be expected from that quarter.

The Husband's Retraction

A recent divorce suit that threatened sensational developments was litigated amicably, the husband having been induced to withdraw his cross-complaint in which he had made some unpleasant charges against his wife. The latter had resided abroad several years, being intent on giving her children a foreign education, and meanwhile her husband was having a very gay time at home. After the latter withdrew his cross-complaint, the wife asked, through her lawyers, for a retraction. She received it in the following words:

"Messrs. So-and-So, Attorneys-at-Law,

"This is to certify that my wife has always been chased," etc., etc.

The retraction would probably have caused an explosion if the attorneys had not persuaded the husband to change his orthography.

Matched Before Their Debut

Two maids about to be launched upon the social sea are said to have already selected life partners for the dangerous matrimonial voyage. One contracted a heart affection during the last term at Vassar, and, unknown to the elders, received a substantial solitaire in token of her bondage. But Cupid—like murder—will out, and notwithstanding threats of all kinds and the dire vengeance of parental authority, the whilom graduate is obdurate and vows that she will abide by her choice. Young fidelity remains to be tested, and "absence makes the heart grow fonder" may prove that it is the sensible exception who forgets. The other damsel was not attracted by an impecunious youth, and she, like the wise virgin, has the approbation of the long-headed generation. The sage term such accidents propinquity, for it seldom happens that the financiering bump develops before the first season out. The maid in question promises to become a distinguished belle, and the announcement of an engagement to the scion of a wealthy Eastern family may be expected when discretion sees fit.

He Distributes Wisely

Of all the young bachelors in town Fred Greenwood carries off the palm for the most successful host. He is a past master in the art of placing personalities. The clever sit by the dull, and the latter, in the egotism of their species, fail to see the reflections and fancy themselves the shining light. His last dinner was a jolly affair and the plump heiress was a conspicuous guest. The tabbies cannot determine the difference between the platonic and the erotic and the riddle is still in the hands of the gossips.

Mrs. Sterling Postley is expected to arrive from the East this week. While in New York she was constantly seen in the company of Mrs. Allan Wallace, who by the way has become a grand dame of Gotham. Mrs. Postley is debating a trip around the world with her mother, versus a winter in the South.

They Are Not Rivals

I am in receipt of a letter from Lillie E. Crothers, president, and Emma J. Orvis, secretary of La Jeunesse Doree Club of San Jose, informing me that they "read with deep regret an article that appeared in a recent issue of Town Talk in which the club was put in the position of a seceding rival of a local sister club." They assure me that their club was started before the Young Ladies' Auxiliary of the San Jose Woman's Club, and therefore it could not have seceded from that organization. "La Jeunesse Doree," say my correspondents, "was organized by a number of congenial young ladies for the purpose of taking up lines of study under the direction of special teachers—the social feature being a minor incident. The assertion that the success of La Jeunesse Doree annoys any member of the San Jose Woman's Club is absurd. A prominent member of the Woman's Club is an honorary member of La Jeunesse Doree Club, and several of our members are daughters of ladies belonging to the Woman's Club. There is no unfriendly feeling whatever on the part of La Jeunesse Doree Club toward any other organization, and we know of none toward us." An inaccuracy in Town Talk is the source of as much regret to me as it is to those whom it directly concerns.

A Bohemian Club Artist

Julian Rix, who died last week, was one of the early members of the Bohemian Club. The cartoon "The Absent" which hangs on the club walls with other painted souvenirs of famous jinks, was one of Rix's contributions. Rix excelled as a painter of country scenes. He had a peculiar shade of green that appeared in most of his works and which was in a way a trademark, for no other artist ever used a green exactly like it. The artist was a brother of Ed Rix, who was formerly Alice Rix's husband, and of "Billy" Rix, the attorney.

Porter Garnett, who has supplied material for Bohemian Club jinks at various times, and who has a pretty knack for versifying, is engaged in writing a musical comedy for Fischer's.

Looks Like a Good Scheme

The salon sale at the Palace was such a failure that local artists are now eager for some scheme to be devised to stimulate public interest in their work, and to promote the sale of their pictures. Park Commissioner Altman thinks he has solved the problem. He suggests that one room in the Park Museum be reserved for the pictures of representative Californian artists, and that they be exhibited but not sold there. According to his plan the names and addresses of the artists will be given in the catalogue, and those who approve of the scheme are confident that it will enable them to divert a great deal of tourists' money their way.

The Artistic Temperament

John A. Stanton, the artist, is a funny fellow. Not long ago he was met by a boon companion who said to him, "Come have a drink, John. I haven't seen you for an age." Stanton said he couldn't as one of his babies was ill and he was just going for a doctor. This was about ten o'clock in the morning. Quarter after ten found the two leaning against a bar and five o'clock of the same day found them drinking together in another place. Each time Stanton had been invited to drink he had given the same excuse for not doing so—the doctor for the baby—and then he spent the entire day with his friend. The friend knew perfectly well that the baby's illness was only in the artist's mind and so he had no conscientious scruples.

They Didn't Wait In Vain

Raoul Martinez, who the despatches say is dying, has many friends on this coast. He was for many years a dramatic critic in this city, and was popular in club circles. He was known to the reading public by his pen-names, "Beauclerc" and "Clairbeau." He was a facile and scholarly writer. Many years ago he figured in a pretty romance. He was infatuated with the eldest daughter of a Mr. Hochkofler, who occupied the position of Australian Consul in this city. She, however, bestowed her hand on Charlie Havens, and before the waning of the honeymoon discovered that she had made an unfortunate match. Havens treated her shamefully and she finally separated from him. Martinez was steadfast in his affection but as Mrs. Hochkofler was a strict Catholic she would not obtain a divorce, and as Martinez was of the same faith, with pious resignation they awaited developments. One day the unappreciative husband was accidentally shot while on a hunting expedition, and the unhappy wife was freed from the yoke that chafed. Martinez then pressed his suit with ardor and with success, and they were married amid the great rejoicing of all their friends. For years thereafter they lived in this city, the centre of an intellectual Bohemian coterie, and then they moved to New York.

A Modish Maid

Though Miss Maye Colburn danced long and late at The Assembly on Wednesday night, she was at church Thanksgiving morning. Miss Colburn is one of the most modish dressers of the younger set. She wore a black spangled net at the ball. Her church costume was a dark green of some heavy material, tailored, and a sable collar, stole effect, with hat and muff to match.

Hungry Youths at Debutante Dinners

This is the season for debutante dinners and the harvest time of the hungry youth. No debutante, unless she be very pretty, very clever and quite rich, dares nowadays to face an assembly without having presided at a dinner beforehand, or unless she has been a guest at another debutante's dinner. It is thus that she secures a number of partners. A man who has been a guest at a dinner is bound to dance twice with his hostess, and once with each of her guests, and even an indifferently charming bud can pick up a few other partners. Keep track of the most persistent debutante dinner-givers and you will find the girls who are afraid to trust themselves without an anchor to windward.

Pedagogues Aroused

Public school teachers throughout the interior are very much exercised over a combination of pedagogues in the bay counties, which is said to control the educational policy of the State. It is said that a ring has been organized for the purpose of manipulating the public school system for the aggrandizement of a few, and that outsiders are unjustly treated. One of the purposes of the ring is to block the aspirations of men who are not submissive to the leaders, and the impression prevails that it is useless for a teacher to seek a position in the public schools unless he has the support of the autocratic combination. The political pedagogues, according to the reports that come to me from the interior, dominate the Schoolmasters' Club of San Francisco. It is in this institution that all the programming is done. The club was organized about a year and a half ago on close corporation lines by eight or nine educators of this city, and applications for membership are passed upon by secret ballot. Some prominent educators have been admitted to give tone to the organization, but as a rule men of independent character are barred. Among its members are J. W. McClymonds, City Superintendent of Schools of Oakland, Fred Burke, President of the San Francisco Normal School, E. M. Cox, City Superintendent of Schools of Santa Rosa, and President David Starr Jordan of Stanford. Until recently the name of President Wheeler of Berkeley was on the rolls. It is believed that many unsophisticated educators joined the club in absolute ignorance of its political operations.

Teachers throughout the interior, having become alarmed over the reports concerning the purposes of the ring, are now organizing to thwart the plans of the politicians. They are being rounded up by the heads of the county Boards of Education, and P. M. Fisher, City Superintendent of Schools in Alameda, is at the head of the opposition movement. Circulars have been issued calling for a meeting during the annual convention of the State Teachers' Association, which is to be held in this city during the Christmas holidays. At this meeting an attack will be made on the policy by which power is centralized in the State Board of Education, it being the theory of the interior pedagogues that the ring is fostered by the State officials. A fight will also be made over the question of the advisability of revising the old text books, a proposition favored by the ring and fathered at the last State convention by Richard K. Faulkner, Principal of the Franklin Grammar School, a prominent member of the Schoolmasters' Club. The present text-book commission, consisting of Governor Pardee, State Superintendent of Schools Kirk and Professor Brown of Berkeley, is in favor of going into the open market and securing the best text-books to be had. The ring is in favor of being employed in revising the old ones.

A Curious Ruling

A man was arrested in this city the other day for cruelty to animals for offering live lizards for sale. Just where the cruelty came in was not satisfactorily explained. I am puzzled to know how it is more cruel to sell lizards than to sell dogs, cats or horses, but the amusing feature of the case was the reason given by a police judge for dismissing the case. He said that the testimony failed to establish the fact that a lizard was an animal. Some of our minor officials are remarkable for their ingenuousness. Some time ago an amusing theory was advanced by Superintendent Thomas J. Blakeney, of the Life Saving Service, in explanation of the fact that few bodies of people drowned in the Golden Gate were ever recovered. Blakeney attributed the phenomenon to the amount of sand stirred up by the waves and mixed with the water. "This," he explains, "gets into the body and makes it sink." Of course, the rudimentary law of physics, that the denser a liquid, the more readily a foreign body will float in it, was unknown to the worthy life-saver. According to his theory, a man will sink more quickly in salt water than in fresh.

Mrs. F. M. Smith of Arbor Villa, Oakland, and her daughter, Miss Marion Smith, were made the motif of a very delightful luncheon on Wednesday in the red room of the Bohemian Club. Mrs. Lewis Risdon Mead was the hostess, and the other guests were Mrs. A. L. White, Miss Florence White, Mrs. Frank C. Havens, Mrs. John Scott Wilson, Mrs. Samuel Mountford Wilson, Mrs. Frank M. Wilson, Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, Mrs. Edward A. Selfridge, Mrs. Edward A. Selfridge, Jr., Miss Katherine Selfridge, Mrs. George B. Sperry, Miss Elsie Sperry, Mrs. Hiram C. He intimated there would be trouble if Hyland did not transfer the case, but the judge has ignored his objections.

He Kept in the Background

The news of the death of W. P. Harrington occasioned some surprise in social circles, for the reason that he was of a retiring nature. His very existence was unknown to some of our society people, and by others he was regarded as almost as much of a myth as Monroe Salisbury, who never puts in an appearance at social functions where his wife and daughters shine. Mr. Harrington was known to some as "the husband of Mrs. Harrington." His wife and daughters spent most of their time in town or else rushing about in society in the East. Only intimate friends knew of the existence of the head of the family. The new residence of Mrs. Harrington will be particularly lonely now, with both the daughters away, and it is probable the widow will rent it.

His latest achievement is the two lions at the entrance of the Art Institute. Kemys is a modest man who does not boast, but does things. He has had hunting adventures of all kinds, and would be a mine of interest for interviewers, if they could get him to talk. But they can't.

Henry Miller's Chicago "Mash"

In Chicago they evidently do not know that Henry Miller is a married man and the father of children. For a Chicago weekly recently referred to the actor as being of the heart-whole and fancy-free order of mortals. This designation was made in reference to a crush Henry once had on Mrs. Robert Hurlburt of the Windy City, daughter of the late R. M. Hooley of Hooley's theatre. Mrs. Hurlburt is a beautiful widow, and she met Mr. Miller at Newport. They had a little flirtation and later continued it at Narragansett Pier. The Miller-Anglin season in Chicago, by the way, has been a big success. Miss Anglin's Camille was considered by the critics to be an even greater impersonation than Bernhardt's or Duse's. But the culture of Chicago is of the stockyards redolent. There is nothing approximating it outside of Chicago. It has a world-wide reputation as the city that discovered that Rostand did not write "Cyrano de Bergerac," and as the centre of Standord Oil education.

Eloquent and Theatrical

The Reverend Robert E. Lee Craig has succeeded in infusing new life into the congregation of Grace church. He has a name that is easy to conjure with among our Southerners, but he does not depend on it to enthuse his flock. He is a magnetic as well as an eloquent pulpit orator. Heretofore it was believed that old-fashioned, conservative Episcopalians were prejudiced against eloquent rectors with a passionate top-note, but the Rev. Craig appears to have succeeded in pleasing all elements in his congregation. He is a young man, very sincere in his manner, somewhat theatrical in his delivery, and oh! so different from the late Dr. Foute. But he never fails to stir his hearers.

That Menace to the Nation Subject

The Bachelor-Old Maid symposium is probably the most popular one ever started by a daily paper. Several correspondents have written to me to ask my opinion of the debated subject. One signing herself "A Society Bachelor Maid" writes as follows:

I wish you would say something about the spirit of generosity that animates the bachelor girl. Is it not very kind and sweet of her to be willing to stay single and let the other girls have all the matrimonial chances? There are so many girls who are dying to be married, and there aren't husbands enough to go around, you know. Don't you think it dear of us to be willing to give up our chance to them?

A college man, writing himself "A Philosopher," says:

In regard to this controversy it strikes me that most of the men who have accomplished great things have been free from matrimonial fetters. I beg to draw your attention to Schubert, Beethoven, Bellini, Donizetti and Cimarosa, great composers; Humboldt and Kant, supreme philosophers; J. G. Whittier, our American poet of poets, and others—all bachelors. Would Galileo have discovered the application of the pendulum, and that the earth revolves, had he been hampered by domestic cares? How about Hugens, the astronomer who discovered Saturn's ring? Wasn't he a bach? Dr. Hahnemann, the originator of homeopathy, Dr. Gail, the originator of phrenology, Guerecke, who invented the air-pump, Erasmus, the metaphysician, Baron Liebig, the world-renowned chemist—all these were single men. As Mrs. Peter Meserve says, in Kate Douglas Wiggin Riggs's latest book—"There's men that would marry once a year if their wives would die fast enough, but there's men that seem to want to live it alone." Haven't they a right to live their lives in their own way?

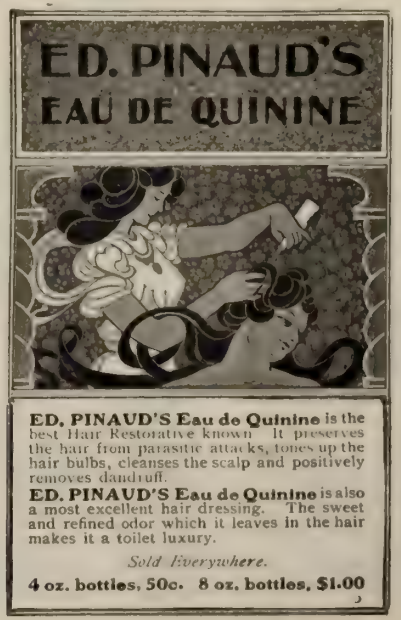
They Are Not All Marines

Confusion, as well as amusement, is often created by the recklessness with which the press, even through its most intelligent representatives, makes use of the phrase "landed marines," or in other ways brings in the word "marines" in connection with certain operations of the Navy, as at Panama at the present time. As a matter of fact, marines usually form but a small part of the landing forces from the warships. Even the largest battleships do not carry over seventy-five marines. Cruisers carry from sixteen to forty or fifty. Gunboats seldom carry any, save a few for orderly duty. What the papers really mean is that the ships land bluejackets and marines. The bulk of every landing force from American men-of-war is composed of blue-jackets, as may readily be seen from the excellent illustrations in Harper's Weekly, although even that ordinarily accurate journal labels the sailors "marines." Marines are only the nucleus of naval shore parties.

Jealousy on the Transports

The resignation of Captain M. B. Buford from the command of the transport Thomas was the natural result of an anomalous condition which has injured the transport service since its establishment, namely, the maintenance of a sort of dual command, having two captains on the same vessel, one a mariner, the other an army officer. The arrangement is a silly one, to say the least, and was due solely to the absurd objection of some army officers to having any but an army officer in a position of authority. Efforts have been made to avoid friction between the sailor-captain and the soldier-captain on the troopships, but difficulties are always bound to crop up when the soldier-captain imagines that his sphere is invaded. The exact lines of demarcation between the spheres of the two officers are not distinct, and are subject to much elasticity under the pressure of mutual jealousy. Jealousy, in fact, principally on the side of the soldier-captain, has been the root of practically all the conflicts of authority. As for Buford, he was a man of a type that the transport service needs. He is an Annapolis graduate, and served as an officer in the Navy for many years. His ship was always a model one and it was undoubtedly galling to a man of his training and experience to be rubbed down the wrong way by an underling in the quartermaster department of the army, whose knowledge of things nautical was trifling. The remedy for the troubles and absurdities of the existing system is the granting of Army commissions to the captains in the transports, and the removal from the latter of the wholly unnecessary quartermaster-captains, except in a subordinate capacity.



Short on Armament

While the development of the Navy in the quality and number of its new ships has proceeded with gratifying speed, it has dawned upon the Navy Department that it has not only an insufficient number of officers to handle the new ships, but an insufficient number of guns to arm them. In fact, the production of ships has gone far ahead of the production of guns, until the Department now finds itself in a serious predicament. It takes months and years to produce modern guns. It also takes a peculiar machinery plant to fabricate them. In the present emergency the Navy Department, having but one gun-factory, that at Washington, D. C., has been compelled to call upon the War Department for aid, and arrangements have just been made for the manufacture of twenty-four 8-inch and twenty-four 7-inch guns for the Navy at the Army arsenal at Watervleit. It is not unlikely that some provision may have to be made during the present Congress for giving out some of the ordnance work of the Navy to private contractors, for otherwise most of the ships recently contracted for may have to lie idle for a long period for lack of armament. The situation is a more serious one than most people imagine, and it cannot be brought too soon or too forcibly to the front during this winter's legislation.

Is Hobson Sane?

Evidence accumulates daily that Richard Pearson Hobson, "the hero of the Merrimac," did not escape entirely unscathed from his dramatic ordeal in the harbor of Santiago. While he seems to have suffered no noticeable physical harm from his exploit, there are reasons for believing that the strain affected his mind. While being lionized in this city some time ago he betrayed his egotism to such an extent as to disgust many people. As a receptacle for hot-air he is unsurpassed. He is a poseur and a glutton for adulation, especially when it is supplied by women. However, bottomless conceit may not be conclusive evidence of insanity, though it does signify a weak mind, but it is hard to believe that a sane man would prepare such a bill as the one which Hobson contemplates presenting to Congress, providing for the expenditure of nearly three billion dollars for the increase of the navy. He thinks he is a friend of the navy but he is one of its worst enemies. While we want a fleet commensurate with our needs, and while Congress and the people show a growing appreciаtion of the service and a desire to develop it rationally, Hobson comes forth with a proposition likely, by its boyish absurdity, to overthrow all the good work of wise heads. Such a suggestion is calculated to throw ridicule on the navy and to suggest that Hobson is a fit subject for the lunacy commissioners.

The Gallant Bell

Now that General Leonard Wood is under fire at Washington by reason of his unprecedented promotion, on the score of the President's friendship, attention is directed to the fact that one of the most conspicuous victims of the injustice that will be done in the event of the Senate's confirmation is General J. Franklin Bell. The latter received his commission of brigadier-general fifteen days after Wood was honored for non-military services as Governor of Cuba. General Bell is five years older than Wood and in the regular course will be retired five years earlier. Therefore if General Wood's appointment should stick General Bell would be forever barred from the command of the army unless Wood should die. Yet Bell is one of the heroes of the army and he won his present rank by services of the most distinguished character. He graduated from West Point in 1874, and when Leonard Wood was appointed from civil life as an assistant surgeon, Bell had served seven years as a soldier and had seen active service on the staff of General Forsyth in the Wounded Knee campaign. But it was in the Philippines that he won distinction. As head of the Bureau of Information he kept the Commanding General forewarned of the designs of the Filipino leaders, but when the storm burst in 1899, desiring active service, he obtained permission from General MacArthur to join his command as a free lance.

How He Won the Medal

He organized a company of Montana volunteers, and no service was too hazardous for the intrepid Kentuckian. General MacArthur, who is now commandant at the Presidio, admits that as a scout Bell was indispensable. He was literally the eyes of the army. Too valuable to serve in a minor capacity, he was made Colonel of the Thirty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, and he kept the natives on the run day and night. He often surprised the Filipinos in their camps before dawn. At Porac he won the medal of honor, by charging alone when far in advance of his regiment, a captain and seven privates of the enemy, although he had but one cartridge in his revolver. He captured the captain and two privates while the others were trying to shoot him from his horse. "This feat and many similar ones," wrote General MacArthur, in recommending him for the medal of honor, "have been performed by Colonel Bell during this war, and the wonder is that he still lives." In 1900 Bell rendered such valuable service as commander of the military district of Luzon, both as an organizer and a fighter, that President McKinley sent his name to the Senate and signed his commission as brigadier-general on February nineteenth, 1901. Bell was promoted over the heads of other officers but there was no complaint, because he had earned promotion, and yet General Wood was his senior as a brigadier-general, though he had seven years' less experience in the army, and had never been in more than one engagement.

Mrs. Percy Kessler will leave next Tuesday for Fort Totten, to join her husband. She will be accompanied by both her children, little "Captain Bill" and his new baby sister.

Mr. W. H. Mills having leased his home, and Mrs. Mills having resigned from the patronesses of the Assembly, it is now pretty generally believed that the veteran railroad man is about to sever his connection with the Southern Pacific Company, and that the family contemplates spending a long time abroad. They are now living very luxuriously in a family hotel with their own servants and a private dining-room.

An Entering Wedge

The visit of Mrs. Henry Oxnard with her sisters-in-law at Santa Barbara is said to be one of the steps taken by Mr. Oxnard's family toward affecting a reconciliation with his wife. The Oxnards did not like it when Henry married his pretty wife, who had been Mrs. Robert Oxnard's maid, but they long since decided that their opposition was absurd. Mrs. Henry Oxnard has made an admirable wife and mother, and she is as cultured as she is charming and womanly. She is extremely charitable as well as ambitious, and I have heard that it is she who urges Mr. Oxnard to try for the United States Senate. Mrs. Robert Oxnard, by the way, has as yet done nothing toward entertaining her sister-in-law, but it is expected she will follow the Misses Oxnard's example.

The Unknown Bard

My esteemed puritanical friend, Senator Bard, refused to recommend Arthur Fisk for the postmastership, for the reason, as he explained, that he did not know him personally. However he made no objection. It was rather a curious reason for withholding a recommendation, emanating as it did from Senator Bard. When Bard was elected United States Senator he was known to fewer members of the legislature than was any man that ever received the toga at the hands of a legislative body. He was elected because he was unknown. It was his obscurity that safeguarded him from protest. But how could he better argue himself unknown than to confess his unacquaintance with the Speaker of the Assembly of his own State?

The Awakening of Nevada

The people of Nevada are now more hopeful and cheerful than they have been at any time since the Bonanza days. The government irrigation work now in progress in that State promises unprecedented development in an area three times the size of Indiana but with a population scarcely large enough for a thriving county. The development of Nevada is a matter of great interest to the people of the whole coast, and it is of vital importance to California. If instead of forty thousand people in Nevada, four hundred thousand will be able to find prosperous homes there, the conditions of internal trade and commerce will be revolutionized, and San Francisco as the metropolis of the coast will be quick to profit by the metamorphosis. Since her admission Nevada has never proceeded upon the theory that her lands should be preserved for home builders, and the consequence is that the State is at a standstill. She received from the government two million acres of land to be located anywhere her lawmakers saw fit. The bulk of the valuable domain was turned over by kind-hearted legislators, at the suggestion of Colonel Mazuma, to stockmen, and the lands are located up and down every stream and surrounding every spring and water hole in the State. So that while Nevada has today some sixty million acres of public land, there is not a quarter section of it upon which a homesteader could make a living. However, the government plans contemplate the reclaiming of three million acres, and when these are opened to settlement, the sagebrush State will take a new lease of life, and there will be speedy development of a region of naturally great agricultural possibilities.

Not a hitch marred the trial trip of the new cruiser Tacoma which steamed into Santa Barbara on Monday within the required time. It is said the success of the trip was largely due to the energy and enthusiasm of the officers, and why should this not have been so? Ayala was the champagne served in the cabin during the trip, and Ayala is always inspiriting. It was in this now reigning favorite brand of champagne that the Tacoma's health was drunk as she steamed into port, achieving her great success.

In Financial Circles

The volume of business has again been extremely light, transactions aggregating $53,000 bonds, and 2417 shares, the latter divided into 1472 shares Gas & Electric, 110 shares Water, 25 shares Bank, 525 shares Sugar and 285 shares Miscellaneous stocks.

Dealings in Gas & Electric comprised about 60 per cent of the total dealings. The declaration of a $2.50 dividend, contrary to all just expectations, had a depressing effect on the stock, the closing price being $66. It is stated the bond issue had not been a perfect success; even if this is so it should not affect the value of the stock. The semi-annual rumor of fresh negotiations with the Mutual Electric is to be heard once more. —The Financier.

The Star

The night shut in with black and threatening frown
When o'er my troubled world the sun went down,
Forebodings marked the time with vague distress
That bound me prisoner to hopelessness,
And darkness seemed more fearful to my sight
From having known the glory of the light.

The hours dragged on; I raised my drooping head
But not in hope, I knew the sun was dead,
And planned no life beyond the black expanse
When, lo, I saw a wondrous light advance
That glowed and grew until it filled the skies.
I stood and gazed with yearning, doubting eyes.

No more does hope's hurt wing trail idly down,
No more does night shut in with threatening frown,
I grieve no more because the sun is gone,
Hold no regret for yesterday's lost dawn,
But bless the salient gloom that reached afar,
For else how had I ever found the star?

The Insanity Plea

"Now," said Mr. Blackstone, "if I am to defend you I must have a thorough understanding of all the facts of the case. You say you visited the lady to pay your respects, and that you quarreled with the deceased whom you met in her apartments?"

Slaughter: "Yes sir."

Mr. Blackstone: "Did he assault you?"

Slaughter: "No, sir."

Mr. Blackstone: "What provoked your assault?"

Slaughter: "My feelings."

Mr. Blackstone: "Didn't you feel that your life was in danger?"

Slaughter: "Well, I should say not."

Mr. Blackstone: "Then why did you shoot him?"

Slaughter: "Because he was too fresh."

Mr. Blackstone: "Well, it appears to me that you have absolutely no defense. You evidently murdered the man through caprice and in cold blood."

Slaughter: "I guess you're about right."

Mr. Blackstone: "Weren't you interfering to protect the lady from insult?"

Slaughter: "No. It was just simply a case of two Southern gentlemen meeting and getting into an argument."

Mr. Blackstone: "Well, then, he must have had a bowie knife."

Slaughter: "No, he didn't have even a pen-knife."

Mr. Blackstone: "Sure he didn't raise a chair to brain you?"

Slaughter: "Quite sure. If he had I'd have filled him full of holes. As it was I only pumped one shot into him, and then he rushed to the telephone to call a doctor. I broke the 'phone because I wanted to see him bleed to death."

Mr. Blackstone: "Well, under the circumstances there's only one defense that I can put in."

Slaughter: "And what's that?"

Mr. Blackstone: "Insanity—the last resort of the cold-blooded, heartless assassin."

"Monna Vanna"

Maeterlinck's "Monna Vanna," which a British censor barred from the London stage because he objected to a lady's going through two scenes with nothing on but a pair of sandals and a bath-robe, was produced by the Yiddish actors of the Thalia theatre in the New York Bowery last week. It created a sensation. According to the New York Sun's critic the play sends the thrills up and down one's backbone. The story of "Monna Vanna" is not likely to receive the approval of the librarians of Sunday-schools. Prinzivalle, the mercenary commander of the Florentine forces beseiging Pisa, sends word to Guido, the commander of the Pisan forces, that he wants Guido's wife. He wants her right away, and she must come out to his tent "her cloak for all her covering." If she comes, as specified, Prinzivalle will betray his employers and send enough munitions of war and food into Pisa to save the city. Prinzivalle, incidentally, has discovered that the Florentine government is jealous of his popularity and is secretly preparing to accuse him of treasons he never contemplated. Guido, Monna Vanna's husband, prepares to sacrifice the city to a Florentine massacre rather than let his wife make the sacrifice. Monna Vanna and the Pisans, however, overrule him, and she goes. Prinzivalle receives her in his tent, after an open break with the Florentine representatives who accompany the army. He finds his passion suddenly controlled by her lovely purity—so much so that when he expresses some wonder whether it can really be true that she has come to him "as specified," and she (so read the stage directions) "makes a gesture as if to prove it by throwing open the cloak. He stops her by a sign." By their conversation it appears that Prinzivalle fell in love with her when he was twelve and she was eight. Those things happen early in Italy. All his adventures, his battles, his renown since had been but steps, in his own mind, toward the day when he should gain her. The lady is touched. She ponders dangerously on the assumption that he has thrown away his station, his good name, and life itself for the sake of possessing her for a few hours. He honorably explains that all these things would be forfeit to cruel and jealous Florence, anyway, even had he not taken possession of her. He doesn't want to make this confession, but honor forces it. Monna Vanna is so touched by his telling her thus his real situation—that she melts from stony indifference and lets him hold her hand. Morning comes and they still sit in chaste conversation, reminiscent of their childhood affection. They are disturbed by news that a Florentine commissioner approaches with intent to arrest Prinzivalle. They go to the door of the tent and see Pisa in the distance, riotously celebrating the arrival of Prinzivalle's bounty, the unearned price of Vanna's acquiescence. The lady persuades Prinzivalle to flee to Pisa with her, promising all possible hospitality from Guido, her husband, when Prinzivalle's considerate abstemiousness shall have been made known. Kisses—forehead kisses, traditionally unemotional and pure—are exchanged. They flee to Pisa, Prinzivalle putting his arm about her waist because she is a faint, weak woman and needs the help of a great, strong man. The Pisan populace receives Vanna with idolatrous acclaim. It does not recognize Prinzivalle. Guido is somewhat too much taken up with his own troubles to share the popular joy. But when Prinzivalle is introduced to him he is not as hospitable as Vanna has promised. He declines to believe that Prinzivalle has been good. He insists that Vanna has brought the Florentine scoundrel home with her to be tortured to death. Monna Vanna asserts and reasserts in vain her guest's innocence and nobility of soul. "I have issued from his tent as I might from my brother's house!" she says. Guido will not believe it. He begins to make preparations for a torturing party in the basement dungeons. Monna Vanna, her word doubted, her claims to purity rejected, is overwhelmed with a wild love for Prinzivalle, who has sacrificed all for her and gained nothing. With a woman's recklessness and quick intuition she sets about saving him. She declares that Prinzivalle did all that anybody could imagine he had done—and more. She had brought the ravisher home, not that Guido might kill him, but that she might do it herself, at her leisure and privately. She whispers passionately loving words to Prinzivalle the while, promising that they shall be united and flee together. She obtains the privilege of putting him to death in a distant dungeon. She stipulates that she must go to the dungeon all alone by herself. She goes toward the dungeon—to which he has been carried—crying these double-edged words:

"I must have it alone, that I may be sure—that no one else—It was indeed an evil dream * * * but a fairer one begins. Ah, * * * a fairer one begins!"

This play has long been popular on the Continent. Mrs. Pat Campbell wanted to produce it in this country but was discouraged.

A Disgruntled Playwright

E. C. Benson, the author of "Aunt Jeannie," the play in which Mrs. "Pat" Campbell appeared in this city, and which failed to arouse anybody's enthusiasm, has written a novel called "The Relentless City," in which he scores the dramatic critics of New York. He says that they are a lot of incompetents, basing his opinion, no doubt, on their inability to appreciate his play. The book is interesting by reason of the fact that Mrs. Campbell is his heroine. Though he credits her with some lovable and fascinating qualities, his characterization of her is likely to make her as furious as she was with the younger Burne-Jones when he printed his celebrated picture, "The Vampire." The book is sure to cause a great deal of talk for it is a severe roast on Americans and American methods.

Brusie's Burlesque

With becoming modesty, Mr. Judson Brusie, attorney-at-law and dilettante playwright, launched his maiden effort in the musical comedy line anonymously. But there is no reason why Mr. Brusie should blush for his tentative essay in the field so long and lucratively exploited by Mr. Edgar Smith, librettist of Weber & Field's burlesque theatre. His "I. O. U.," which was produced at Fischer's last Monday night, does not establish him as the legitimate successor of Charley Hoyt, but it is far above the ruck of inanities with which we have been pestered in this city of late. If that Chicago contract humorist who afflicted us with "Rubes and Roses," and that other bit of trash that preceded it, is permitted to make a living by grinding out pieces so devoid of substance and merit, then there is hope for Judson Brusie. Mr. Brusie has a well developed sense of the ridiculous, a fact that is evidenced by what little plot there is at the bottom of "I. O. U.," but in constructing the burlesque he was not in a sufficiently foolish mood to insure a trail of laughter through the acts. As a travesty on Organized Labor "I. O. U." is funny, but the dialogue lacks the sparkling humor and the effervescent repartee that raises laughter in the Weberfieldian burlesque. It is evident that Mr. Brusie was handicapped by the effort to adapt his characters to the people of the company. The only distinct characterization that he has given us is that of the walking delegate, and the type is not much of an exaggeration. He pelts Organized Labor mercilessly, but in a way that evokes considerable laughter. There is nothing offensive in the travesty. It is palpable burlesque which appeals to everybody, including union men, because it is justified by actual occurrences. Indeed there is so much truth underlying the burlesque, that "I. O. U." is well worth polishing. Many of Edgar Smith's most successful pieces were less amusing when first presented than Jud Brusie's maiden effort. In the hands of talented mummers with a keen sense of humor they were metamorphosed into uproarious comedy. There is abundant material for suggestion in the piece now running at Fischer's, and even in its present shape it goes with considerable sparkle, though there is a perceptible absence of spontaneity, and a tendency to force situations to the limit. For instance there is too much repetition in the scene in which each of the hotel keepers negotiates privately with the walking delegate for special advantages. It appears as though Mr. Brusie was so impressed with his own humor that he couldn't help nursing it. The piece is well staged, and the three dialect comedians make the most of their parts. Miss O'Ramey introduces a new specialty in which she repeats her initial triumph and the Althea sisters do a very good acrobatic dance. The music was written by Dr. H. J. Stewart, and is so good that the paucity of it is a matter of regret. The ensemble numbers are very catchy and the song "Here's to the Little Tin Pail" is tuneful enough to be barrel-organed.

PAULINE HALL.

The original "Erminie," who will sing at the Orpheum next week.

Barney Bernard Is Going

There are rumors at Fischer's of impending changes in the company of considerable importance. I believe the management has reached the conclusion that new blood is needed, and manager Friedlander, who is now in the East, is said to be on a still hunt for talent. Barney Bernard will sever his connection with the company in two weeks. He is going to Los Angeles to join a company being organized by Ollie Morosco for the production of the Weberfieldian burlesques.

How Counterfeiters Work

It is quite a long time since the Central had anything quite so full of sensations as "The Counterfeiters." It is a very thrilling melodrama, and the audience seems to appreciate the thrills. Part of the pleasure in attending a Central show is supplied by the gallery. The comments of the gods are always audible to those below, and their enthusiasm or lack of it is what makes or damns the performance.There's plenty of opportunity for applause in "The Counterfeiters," in the situation where Mayall as an amateur detective does the "johnny on the spot" act a la Sherlock Holmes. Miss Lawton is as usual a sympathetic persecuted heroine, and Shumer shines in his star role of the villain still pursuing . Georgie Woodthorpe does a neat turn in character as an old apple woman. The scenery is in harmony with the spirit of the play.

Tommy Atkins Mahr

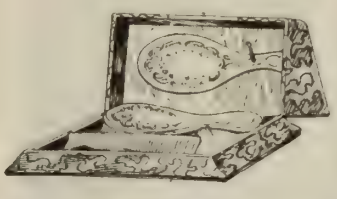
Agnes Mahr, who is cakewalking on her toes at the Orpheum this week, says that she fell into the cakewalk quite by accident. She was appearing at Tony Pastor's in a Japanese dance, and the piano player began throwing in some syncopated notes of his own, which changed the rhythm into ragtime. Before Miss Mahr knew it she had dropped into the rhythm and was cakewalking for all she was worth. She retained the toe cakewalk in her repertory, took it to Australia and made a hit there with it. Her Tommy Atkins dance, by the way, is not English though it has a British name. It was really originated in New York in "Broadway to Tokio." Miss Mahr has not been to London yet but will go there in February. She has been all over the Australian and South Sea circuit. Her dances are somewhat similar to those Arnold Grazer does, but she has a variety of beautiful costumes that please the eye and lend color to the pas seuls.

MARIE HEATH.
Who will begin a starring engagement at the Grand Opera House tomorrow afternoon in the new rural comedy drama, "For Mother's Sake."

The Blair-Grismer Drama

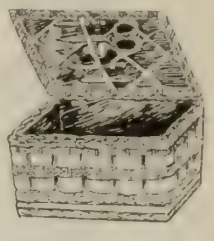
Joe Grismer has probably made more money out of "Way Down East," which he edited for Lottie Blair Parker, than out of any of his earlier and more artistic works. There are people in every city who would not miss seeing "Way Down East" for worlds, and they go to see the piece every time it strikes their town. This is its third visit to San Francisco, but it still draws, and at the same theatre. It has not lowered its admission price, or offered souvenirs as magnets; it simply draws on its clean, wholesome merits. The same reasons for this, I presume, are those that made "The Old Homestead" a steady money-winner. There's nothing new about the present Columbia production. It's the same "Way Down East" with the realistic snowstorm and the hired boy as the chief attractions. There's a new Anna this time, who is more lifelike and sympathetic than either of her predecessors. They all imitate Phoebe Davies, but I suppose that is the right thing to do, since we can't have the original Anna. William Lamp as the "city feller" with his wicked heart and witching ways is not exactly at home. Still, with Lamp as the villain, one can understand why Anna fell in love with this handsome sinner in preference to the saintly ruralities about her. I suppose there's nothing William Lamp hates so much as to be called a "beauty man," but he can't help it. It's one of the evils of matinee idolism that it will take years to live down. He is a capable actor but his forte is juvenile roles.

The great scene in "Over Niagara Falls" is where the heroine goes over in a barrel. It is a bigger act than that of the famous Blondin, and appeals to the gallery and parquet alike. I am told that real water was at first used in this scene, but electricity and lights now give the required effect without the fluid's aid. It's a good spectacular show, of the kind that made money for the late Walter Morosco in the years that are agone. The Grand seems like the old Morosco's theatre this week. Los Angeles, by the way, liked this spectacular feast so well that it played five extra performances there, doing close upon a thirty-five hundred dollar business the first week. There are three "Over Niagara Falls" companies touring this country, and one in England.



The more you see of McIvor-Tyndall and his marvelous demonstrations of thought-transference, mind-reading, telepathy, hypnotism, the more you are mystified and the more serious are your thoughts. There is nothing in the surroundings to suggest the supernatural, and everything is done before your full view on the platform in full glare of the lights, or right among you in the audience. A committee of citizens, composed of well-known ladies and gentlemen, is with him when he is off the platform and behind the scenes, and about him when he is on the platform. You do not know what to think about it; you are nonplussed and can only marvel, and marvel you do as you have never done. You may well say that this man is wonderfully endowed with some mysterious power. The psychic demonstrations were unusually interesting last Sunday night, and Steinway hall was packed to the doors with an appreciative audience. Tyndall in his lecture made clear the distinction between direct thought-transference and telepathic communication, and cited many instances of both phenomena. The scientist will give "Proofs of Immortality" as his theme for tomorrow night; the lecture will be followed by some novel and startling experiments in occult phenomena. Tyndall will undoubtedly have his usual crowded house.

Ellery's Italian Band



Tomorrow night Ellery's Italian Band will begin a series of concerts which will run through the week ending Sunday night the thirteenth, at the Alhambra, under the management of Will Greenbaum. The band has been increased by eight new soloists and the programs will be particularly interesting. At the opening concert the program will include "March of the Drums" by Chiaffarelli, the conductor, the Italian overture "The Girl of Asturia" by Secchi, Siberian Scenes by Marengo, selections from Puccini's "La Tosca" and "La Gioconda" and some light numbers. The soloist will be Antonio Decimo, said to be the greatest clarinetist ever heard in this city. Monday night's program will be made up of numbers by Verdi and Bizet, while Wednesday's will be Wagner and Gounod. Every night during the week varied programs will be given with soloists at each concert. The Saturday night program will be very jolly and popular, and at this one concert smoking will be permitted as at the London Smoker Pops.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"Way Down East" will go another week at the Columbia. Lulu Glaser in "Dolly Varden" comes next. The music of "Dolly Varden" is by Julian Edwards and the book by Stanislaus Stange.

"I. O. U." has hit the taste of Fischer's patrons and will be continued. The Press Club benefit will occur on the afternoon of December fifteenth at Fischer's and a fine program of original features will be added to the regular bill.

"A Royal Prisoner," at the Alcazar, will be new to San Francisco. It is a comedy drama in four acts, Russian in theme, brilliant with military trappings, and aglow with the picturesque and romantic. Its story turns upon the pivot of mistaken identity which swung "The Prisoner of Zenda" into such popular esteem. There are dramatic moments and an abundance of very droll comedy situations. James Durkin will be the fascinating Russian swashbuckler and Adele Block will find forceful opportunity as the ardent and imperious daughter of the Czar. One of the most distinctive and successful of American plays, to follow December fourteenth, will be "The Girl I Left Behind Me." And then comes, for holiday times, Joseph Arthur's famous "Blue Jeans," with its apple orchard, bull calf, brass band, barbecue and sensational buzz saw episode.

There's a leap for life from Harlem bridge, the burning of a canal boat and a thrilling snowstorm in "New York Day by Day," the sensational melodrama which will be the Central's bill next week. Among the impressive electrical effects will be sunset, moonlight and early dawn, depicted in a maze of varied hues; the great blizzard, the electrical snowstorm, and fog on the bay. The cast will be a strong one, and specialties will be rendered during the acts.

Marie Heath, in the opinion of many the best soubrette on the American stage, will begin a week's engagement at the Grand tomorrow matinee, in the latest rural drama. "For Mother's Sake" is a play of New England life by Carrie Ashley-Clarke. There are many opportunities in it for novel scenic effects. Miss Heath will appear as Jo Pemberton, a character which abounds in light, feminine touches and which is thoroughly devoid of the rough, heavy, stilted masculine character which so many actresses who play boys' parts consider it a necessity to affect. The company in support includes Eunice Goodrich, Adelaide Plunkett, Clara Beyers, Theodore Pottle, Dolly Davenport, Ella Blake, "The McKinley Twins," Charles Plunkett, J. Edwin Brown, Jos. Schaefer, Jr., Jos. W. Walsh, Pete Raymond, Edwin Roy, Geo. W. Lyons, Alexander Lawrence and William Pottle, Jr. Sunday matinee, December thirteenth, J. H. Stoddart, the oldest actor on the American stage, and Reuben Fax, will appear in "The Bonnie Brier Bush."

At the Orpheum Pauline Hall, the original "Erminie," will exhibit a number of her latest gowns and sing her most popular ballads, operatic airs and other songs. Francesca Redding will present for the first time one of Will Cressy's best sketches, "The Cattle Queen," the story dealing with a United States Senator with a past. Hines and Remington will present "Miss Patter of Patterson," a compound of rapid-fire dialogue. E. I. Edwards will introduce his trained horse, "Bonner," which writes sentences and his own name and adds figures.

At the Chutes will be the Allen sisters, acrobatic stars; Evangeline Dowe, a charming soprano; Conley and Klein, in new specialties; the La Moines, in new selections; Flood and Hayes in their barrel jumping act; Mabel Lamson, in new illustrated songs; Stanley and Carlisle, in a second week of "Mrs. O'Grady's Wash Day." —The Playgoer.

Miss Mott's Reason

"There are two kinds of prudes," she said, "—yes, waiter, I will take a cocktail to begin on, a martini, please. One kind is so because of youthful unsophistication."

"And the other?"

It was very pleasant to Harcourt to be seated opposite this charming woman, whom he had not seen before for seven years.

"Oh, the other is prudish from oversophistication."

"And you are in—which category?" smiled Harcourt.

"Oh, I? I am not in either. I was not a prude in my bud days—and I have not achieved prudity since."

Harcourt's eyes roamed admiringly over Miss Mott's figure. Seven years had only added to her attractions, yet she was by no means a mere girl when he had last seen her.

"You haven't a wrinkle," he said, involuntarily.

"Oh, well, you know what they say about wrinkles," she returned, "that people who never think never have them."

"But that could never apply to you, Hortense."

The name slipped from his lips without thought. She had always been Hortense to him.

"You forget what a science is that of the beauty doctor nowadays, Mr. Harcourt."

Miss Mott shrugged her shoulders.

"No, I won't order," she said to the garcon, as he deposited her martini before her. "You order it all," she added, to her vis-a-vis, "you used to be quite a genius at ordering, I remember."

Was he mistaken, or did a gleam of tenderness shine in those dark blue eyes?

Harcourt had been married just eighteen months, but never a thought did he cast upon his pretty little wife at home. Probably at that moment Mrs. Harcourt was eating a lonely dinner, and worrying about her poor Harold's hard work, the dreadful figures that kept him so busy that he could not even stop to eat his dinner.

Harcourt had been very much in love with that pretty young girl when he wooed and won her. Well, she was his now. She was always there. A man needs a bit of mental change sometimes, preferably of the feminine gender, else he is apt to grow dull.

Never had Hortense Mott been more brilliant. Never had her brilliancy been more frequently punctuated by gleams of rare tenderness and softness. It was in the public dining room at the Gaieties, else he would have dared many things. As it was, eyes spoke to eyes, and lips to ears that heard an undermeaning in every phrase.

"How fortunate that I should have dropped in here to eat my dinner," said Harcourt.

"Call it fate," answered Miss Mott, "that I, too, was eating my lonely meal at the same place."

"Any one who sees us might think we had arranged it so."

"Well, what difference? We shall never eat here again together."

"I hope so—or at some other place," was Harcourt's impassioned retort.

"No, Harold—" the name slipped from her lips as hers had from his an instant since. "One of my strict rules of conduct is never to lunch or dine with a married man whose wife I know."

"But you broke it tonight."

"Ah, but then I did not know whom you had married—that she was an old acquaintance. I remember Alice so well, though she was much younger than I."

"What a queer woman you are—what queer rules you make for yourself."

"Well, one has to have some kind of a code of morals to live by. I don't believe in giving stabs in the dark."

"And if you didn't know my wife you would go to dinner with me again?"

"I might—if you would agree to behave as well as you are doing tonight."

"Didn't I always do everything to please you?"

She laughed, but there was a little catch in her breath as she answered:

"Sometimes you—well, sometimes, Harold, I was a little bit afraid of what you'd do next."

A passionate glint came into his eyes.

"Oh, Hortense, I wish we had our lives to live over again. My God, dear—"

"Hush! There are people all around us. And here's the waiter again. No sugar—bring me a curacoa. Yes, Mr. Harcourt, I still prefer the hard biscuit with my cheese. What a memory you have, Harold."

"Wish I hadn't. Wish I could forget—well, I won't, then, dear. But, Hortense, you don't know what I'm suffering at this moment. To think of what I missed—to think of what a fool I was!"

They sat silent until the menu reached its finis.

"Ce que femme le veut, Dieu le veut!"

she quoted.

"But men will sometimes—and fools they are."

"Spoiled babies always get the things they cry for."

"And spoiled men never care so much for anything until the desired object is out of their reach."

"Well, I must go now, Harold. Thanks—you were always so clever at fastening one's collar. I've never met such a man as you at that since, Harold."

"Now ask me if your hat is on straight, Hortense. Ask me if your nose is the least bit red."

"Oh, don't, Harold—don't remind me of it. How can you remember all those silly things—those silly days?"

"Ask me why I can't forget. Oh, Hortense—" she was standing at the door of her carriage, one foot on the step, "oh, Hortense, why did you will it this way? Why did you not become my wife?"

She was in the cab now, but she looked out of the window, her eyes beautifully, darkly blue and shining with mirth mingled with tenderness.

"Because—why, Harold, don't you see how much better it is this way? Had I been your wife, I should have been at home now, alone and moping, while you were dining with her—or another woman! Good-bye!"

And Hortense Mott, flashing a final brilliant smile at Harcourt as he raised his hat, whirled from his vision.

"I Sent My Soul Through the Invisible"

"I sent my Soul through the Invisible,
Some letter of that After-life to spell:
And by and by my Soul returned to me,
And answered: 'I Myself am Heav'n and Hell.'"
—Omar Khayyam.

What end awaits thee, Soul?—or Heav'n, or Hell?
"O Prison of Clay," she answered, "Time will tell:
Time telleth all things—findeth all!" And, so,
I sent my Soul through the Invisible

To beg the echoes of Time's ceaseless bell,
That careless rings a pæan or a knell,
Some chapter, sentence, line—some single word—
Some letter of that After-life to Spell.

Naked She rode upon the winds, and free,
Tossed up through Space to Time; and royally
She questioned Time, who peered beneath his hand—
And by and by my Soul returned to me.

Heaven's vault gave answer? "'Twas an empty shell
Held to an Infant's ear, with mocking swell!"
And Hell?—Is there such Place of Fire? She smiled,

Helpful Hints for Poor People

[This is the season when What to Give on Christmas is absorbing the minds of many. Our Lady Reporter, who learned her business as Editor-in-Chief of the Sunday supp. of a large and influential metropolitan journal, compiled the following in response to repeated inquiries from the poor relations of many of our opulent subscribers. They are suggestions to people who wish to make holiday gifts without being extravagant.]

Fancy Fuel: A very pretty present can be evolved from nutshells. Save all your nutshells, and ask your friends to save theirs for you. Then when you have gathered a sufficiency, place them in a bag—any corner groceryman will give you a paper bag—and label it "For your holiday fire." Give it to a friend with a grate in her room. She will appreciate it. If you give it to a bachelor with a gas stove in his apartment, he may use the shells to throw out the window at the neighboring felines.

Knickers for Kids: Beg from your married friends their husbands' cast-off trousers. Cut them down and make knickerbockers for your friends' sons. But be careful when you redistribute them to see that no boy receives a pair made from his father's old ones. Also be sure they have a spring to them.

Paper Hats: From the colored supplements of the Sunday papers, and the wire frames of cast-off millinery, you can construct gorgeous hats for your friends' little girls. They may prefer crepe paper, but if you are without funds, or credit at a store, the supps. will do, and will be original as well.

Decorated glasses: Take old jelly glasses, cover them inside with brown paint and outside with cigar rings, laid flat. They will strike you as being ugly, when done, but they will be odd anyway, and can be used as match safes, ash receptacles, for toothpicks, etc.

A very acceptable gift for a poor relation with a large family of girls is a trunkful of cast-off ball gowns, soiled gloves, etc. You and your friends from whom you beg them won't miss them and they will be a source of great pleasure to the girls. If you could also throw in the trunk a few old hats, out of date in style, and some shoes and slippers without mates, it will make the recipients' holiday all the merrier.

A tin bank to an impecunious relative is always a happy gift.

Also an empty stocking to a rich, miserly relative.

MUSIC

The Last Hopkins

The closing musicale of the Hopkins series on Thursday evening brought out a new violinist, a pupil of Henry Heyman, and who though a lad of only eleven years shows remarkable skill and talent. James Hamilton Todd is the boy's name, and his selections were Mozart's Sonata No. 4 for violin and piano, with Miss Elizabeth Howard at the piano, and a Sarabande and Bolero by Bohm. The program was in all a very interesting one, the other participants being Mrs. Greenleaf Kruger and Miss Virginia Pierce, sopranos, Miss Helen Crane, mezzo soprano, and Otto Fleissner, organist. Miss Julia Tharp accompanied for the singers. Mrs. Kruger's numbers were "Listen Here Cavaliere," Von Stutzman, Mrs. Beach's "Extasy" and "Bendemeer's Streams" (old Irish); Miss Crane's, Schubert's "Who is Sylvia" and "When Mabel Sings"; Miss Pierce's, Mignon's Song (Thomas) and "Sunrise" by Wekerlin. Miss Pierce is, by the way, a daughter of Mrs. J. M. Pierce, who was for some years soprano at the First Unitarian church of this city, and is now soprano and choir director of the Berkeley Unitarian church.

Patti's Farewell Tour

Leland Roberts, son of Mr. and Mrs. Roberts of Millbrae, is to have the honor of accompanying Madame Patti on the Apollo on her Pacific coast tour. Mr. Roberts is one of the most accomplished of our younger pianists. The diva has stated during the past week in New York that this is positively her farewell tour, and that at the end of the season she will retire from public life, or at any rate from anything like a regular engagement. It may therefore be taken for granted and without question that Madame Patti speaks the truth, and that those who ever wish to hear her at all must take advantage of this one opportunity. The diva's greatest triumph in New York was her third concert at Carnegie hall. It had been originally intended to give only two, and the third was a test of the financial endurance of the New York public, two appearances of Madame Patti in one week having always been considered sufficient. Her selections at this third concert are likely to be the ones that will be heard principally in all the other cities she will sing at. It was noticeable, also, that on each occasion the great singer appeared her voice seemed to be better. No doubt she was a trifle tired on the first night after her voyage, but at the Wednesday matinee and Saturday evening that marvelous voice, that has never been equaled in this world, is said to have rung out as it rang in its palmiest days. She sang the "Deh Viene" from "The Marriage of Figaro," "Kathleen Mavourneen," "Comin' Thro' the Rye," "Angels Ever Bright and Fair," "Robin Adair" and "Home, Sweet Home."

Concert at Palo Alto

Miss Dorothy Goodsell's pupil recital in Palo Alto on Saturday evening was one of the most artistic musical affairs given in the college town this season. It was an invitational affair, and some of the participants went down from San Francisco. A chorus under the direction of Mr. Arthur Scott Brook, organist of Stanford Memorial church, sang several numbers, and the solo singers were Miss Alberta Jones, Miss Augusta Upham, Mrs. C. A. Week, Miss L. J. Elliott, Miss Grace Partee, Miss Ethel MacFadyen, Miss Grace Kirkpatrick, Miss Ruth Foster, Miss Gertrude Beeger and Dr. G. B. Little, Charles Young and Paul Shattuck of San Francisco. The numbers were all well chosen and the renditions were marked by good expression and admirable diction. Miss Goodsell's San Francisco pupils are now preparing for a recital to be given during the winter.

The choir of the First Congregational church, Oakland, gave the eighth in the series of oratorio services last Sunday evening. As appropriate to Thanksgiving season, Weber's Jubilee (Harvest) cantata was sung by the chorus of sixty voices and the following soloists: Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, soprano; Mrs. Carroll Nicholson, contralto, Arthur A. Macurda, tenor, Walter E. Nicholson, bass, William B. King, organist, and Alexander Stewart, musical director. In addition to the Jubilee Cantata, Weber's "Jubel" Overture was played on the big organ by Mr. King and there was an additional contralto solo by Mrs. Nicholson. Weber's Jubilee Cantata has been given here in its entirety but once before within recent years, and that was by the choir of Trinity church, San Francisco, several years ago. The cantata

The Great Caruso

Enrico Caruso, the Italian tenor who scored a triumph in New York the other night, ranks as the leading tenor in Europe today. He was born in Naples in 1873, and in 1896 made his debut in "Traviata" at the Fondo of Naples, but his first great success came in 1898 at the Lyric, in Milan, when he sang "Navaresse," Leoncavallo's "La Boheme" (in which he is to sing next Friday night at the Metropolitan) and again, at Genoa, in many other works to his own glory and the delight of the Genoese. He appeared at La Scala in Milan, singing Massenet's "Saffo" with great success, and created Giordano's "Fedora" so brilliantly that Italian critics threw up their hats and umbrellas and made puns on the word Fedora, crying aloud that Caruso had indeed made the opera golden. Later, he made a conquering progress through St. Petersburg, Monte Carlo, all the big Italian cities, and invaded South America, singing in Montevideo, Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Ayres, and at the last named place he was re-engaged for summer seasons for five years. He has also been successful in London at Covent Garden, where he is to appear again next summer. Last winter he sang at the Costanzi in Rome, in a long repertory, and afterward in Lisbon. After his third year in South America he sang in Warsaw, where the impresario of the theatre thriftily doubles his prices owing to Caruso's great popularity. He has sung also in Paris and in Trieste, and, in a word, has carried all Europe before him. He has been decorated by King Leopold and King Victor Emmanuel III. Caruso has a commanding presence, though not extremely tall, and is of very heavy build. Among his diversions is his humor for caricature—he draws admirably.

Fritzi a Frost

When Fritzi Scheff was playing small parts in grand opera in this city she was the idol of the clubmen and the darling of the women. They pronounced her the most vivacious little singer they had ever seen. She seemed chic and cute and bubbling over with diablerie. They thought that hers was the sparkling individuality that would win success in comic opera. In the East many people had the same notion. One enterprising manager was so firmly convinced that she was fitted by nature for the comic opera field that he decided to star her in it, and he employed Harry B. Smith, the most indefatigable hack writer of comic operas and musical comedies in the country, to grind out a piece for Fritzi. And now Fritzi is one of the disappointments of the profession. She made her appearance on Broadway last week, in a comic opera called "Babette," and she was totally lacking in exuberance and dash. As Acton Davies remarked, "It is one thing to shine successfully as the village cut-up at the Metropolitan Opera House, when surrounded by staid and middle-aged singers of ingenue roles, but in comic opera Miss Fritzi Scheff will find herself in an entirely different atmosphere." The fact is that in grand opera Fritzi's exuberance was accentuated by contrast. I believe it was Paderewski who called her a little devil. The question on Broadway after the first performance of "Babette" was, "Where, oh where, is Fritzi's little devil?"

Dr. Lawrence Hoffman, who has won local fame as a gynecologist, closed his office about two weeks ago, and left the city on Thanksgiving Day, for a trip to Europe, where he will take a number of post-graduate courses at leading universities in England, Germany and Austria. The genial "Larry," as he is properly known among the younger set of San Francisco, is not expected back before Christmas of 1904. In the meantime, his practice has been left in the hands of skilled practitioners, who can be reached by calling up Dr. Hoffman's residence. The doctor is accompanied on his European journey by another well known San Francisco practitioner, Dr. Henry Meyer, whose office was also located at 751 Sutter street, up to two weeks ago. Dr. Hoffman will be missed by the local musical talent, among whom he has been quite popular.

The Plaint of Authors

The Bookman published in the November number an installment of letters received from writers, in which they give their opinions of the way reviewers treat their books. It is not exactly a new idea, since the Critic has also undertaken something of the kind in past times, and let the world know not only how authors looked upon their critics but how publishers regarded book reviews, and what the reviewers themselves thought about it. There ought not to be any serious difficulties amongst the three classes; at bottom the object of all is the same, to get the facts before the public. When the author writes a book he depends upon the publisher to produce it, and the publisher, in turn, depends upon the reviewer to let the reading and book-buying public know what it is about and whether the author has succeeded in accomplishing his self-imposed task. What is needed is some common ground upon which the majority can meet. It is noticeable that neither authors nor publishers make any complaints of deliberate injustice, nor, in the main, of carelessness. One complaint, however, appears in several of the communications, against those reviewers who try to tell the story again, condensing a thirty-thousand word plot into three hundred, and thereby maiming and mutilating the author's work. Now, right here comes the clash of opinion, for some of the publishers whose views were sought a year or two ago stated that they thought a brief resume of the plot was a factor in attracting the attention of readers. One can sympathize with the authors, who are justified in feeling that their work is belittled when their nut is cracked and the meat picked out, but sometimes the reviewer knows precisely what he is about, especially when dealing with the machine-made products, all of which are turned out of the same mould. By showing how little there is in the thing he places before his readers an argument against wasting time over trash. It is good enough reviewing for books which have only a stereotyped plot on which to depend, and for readers who read nothing but plots. On the other hand, take a good book by an author who knows how to handle his subject, and an outline of a portion of the plot only arouses interest and awakens curiosity. Moreover, those readers who read for anything but the adventures of him and her through a troubled love-episode, know as well as the author and the reviewer that a straight view of the main road gives no conception of the beauties of the by-paths and backwaters, and that no one but the author can paint the author's pictures. Take, for example, any of Jack London's Klondike tales. There is no deeply complicated plot to any of them. Half a dozen sentences would be a large allowance to use in narrating the incidents of most of them, but any one who thinks that he can gain an idea of the power and charm of London's work by that easy process would not be able to appreciate the tales in their entirety. It would not take very long to outline the plot of "The Octopus," but if any one who is furnished with that much does not want more, even that is wasted on him. In general it is safe to conclude that the books that can be spoiled for readers by so much of the plot as can be outlined in a review; the readers who will be turned aside from books because of such small insight into the contents, and the authors who write that kind of books, are "birds of a feather." One is surprised to find Gertrude Atherton taking such a peevish attitude and hinting that critics who are "annoyed at success or power in women" take it out on their books. Like Marie Corelli, she cries out for the abolition of the book review, but one has to suspect that their motive is at bottom the same, for if Marie Corelli and Gertrude Atherton were not advertising themselves by this attitude of protest and revolt a great many good people would forget all about them and their books.

Two Argonauts in Spain

"Two Argonauts in Spain" is the title of Jerome Hart's new book of travels. Mr. Hart is a good traveler inasmuch as he knows what to see and what to shut his eyes to, and the result of his Spanish pilgrimage is a book full of new, crisp impressions recorded in a singularly interesting manner. Books about Spain are numerous enough, and are generally filled to repletion with detailed descriptions of palaces and Alcazars, churches and picture galleries. They abound with dissertations on gypsies and beggars, religion and bull-fights. Mr. Hart avoids these done-to-death topics and finds much instead that is new and untouched. Moreover, we realize from his book that Spain is not a country wholly given over to the traditions of the past; she has her modern side like any other. Moreover, Mr. Hart writes without prejudice. His conclusions on nearly all subjects seem to be fair and uncolored, and he even finds much to admire in that country of contradictions. For example, the French government had offered a reward of twenty-five thousand francs for the arrest of the Humberts. This sum the Madrid police department refused to accept, and the money was finally turned over to the Society of St. Vincent de Paul to be expended in charity. Fancy the San Francisco Police Department refusing five thousand dollars in a similar case. And yet Spain has a reputation for official bribery and greed. Our San Francisco Argonaut was surprised to enjoy fresh fish even in the inland cities of Madrid, Cordova and Seville, and found on the whole the cookery good, without an over-abundance of oil, garlic, or red pepper. The subject of newspapers forms an interesting chapter. There are many newspapers printed on the peninsula, and, as the Argonaut remarks, "if so few Spaniards can read, and so many Spanish journals are printed, the reading Spaniards must be overworked." Some of the journals are evidently as yellow as our own. One weekly is called Ey Escandalo and another The Cake-Walk. Several of the weekly publications are devoted to the interests of the bull ring. Apropos of the latter subject we learn that the star bull-fighters are called espadas and not toreadors, a word only heard outside of Spain. Mr. Hart notices that revengeful feelings toward the United States seem to have disappeared entirely. He expatiates interestingly on the prevalence of cigarette smoking among the men, but saw no women of the better class smoking in public. The lack of heating facilities in the hotels is feelingly described and in sunny Spain the Argonaut first became cognizant of warming pans, objects which heretofore had merely a literary existence like the Phoenix and the Dragon. He was not over-impressed by the Alhambra, but like most places that have been unreasonably raved over it is so infested by guides, tourists, beggars and sham enthusiasts that the result is an unappreciative frame of mind. Spain has its share of labor troubles. At Seville the shoemakers were on strike; at Santander, the coal miners; at Barcelona, the printers, dyers and other artisans; at Reus, the factory hands; at Madrid, the carmen; at Coruna, the factory hands; at Vigo, the railroad men; at Gijon, the cotton factory operatives. At Cadiz, the bakers, the iron workers and the carpenters began a strike which extended to all other trades and precipitated riots which it required the military to suppress. Commenting on the situation, a writer in the Epoca finds consolation in the fact that like conditions exist in the United States! It will be seen from the topics touched upon that "Two Argonauts in Spain" is by no means of the guide book order ,but is fresh and original both in style and matter. It is beautifully gotten up by Payot, Upham & Company, on thick linen paper with extra wide margins. The half-tones are beautifully executed, and the binding is heavy boards stamped in gold. A fine map accompanies the volume. The cover design is composed of the emblems of Spanish cities. It would be an admirable holiday gift, particularly as San Francisco can claim credit for both authorship and publication.

The Pepper Books

In "The Five Little Peppers at School" Margaret Sidney has gone back into the history of her interesting family to tell of some of their sayings and doings before they grew up and went abroad. This book will be best appreciated by those fortunate little folks who have already made the acquaintance of Ben and Joel and Davie and Polly and Phronsie, and if by chance there are any who never were introduced to them, now is a good opportunity. Just what the children did at school and at home is of less importance than what they are. The Peppers are well-bred little folks, respectful to their elders and considerate of their playmates. They are not slangy, flippant or precocious, but very safe companions with whom to leave boys and girls. Their fun is wholesome, and they have plenty of it, but they have their share of work and lessons as well. It is a pity there are not more Mamsies in this generation, and heartily as one can recommend the Pepper books to boys and girls, there is just as good reason to call the attention of mothers to them. Automobile Topics

Some auto experts are now advocating the abandonment of pneumatic tires in favor of solids. It is contended that a car on proper springs would run better on solid than on pneumatic tires, and then the absence of worry would be most pronounced. The expert motorist as well as the inventor is always looking for a tire that cannot be punctured, but no one has really produced a tire absolutely proof against punctures or collapse in some form or other. Apart from the worry and expense there is the continued uncertainty of the occupants of the car, not knowing what is going to happen next or where they may be stranded. This is where the pneumatic tire differs from the general mechanism, which the public realize in most high class cars is perfectly reliable, and that it is simply a question of tires whether they adopt the motor car in preference to the carriage or not. If the public felt that the tires were as good as the mechanism the manufacturers would have no difficulty in doubling the number of motorists. That being the case, solid tires are bound to come into general use, though of course the pneumatic is being perfected every day, and as a matter of fact they are almost immune to collapse from ordinary causes.

An automobile entirely of home construction is interesting the curious at San Luis Obispo. The machine was designed by and is in process of building under the personal inspection of W. H. Wright of that city. It is a French tonneau in style and has individual, finely upholstered seats for five persons. The engine is fifteen horsepower and the speed about thirty miles an hour. It is not a cheap motor, by any means, but Mr. Wright preferred to have it built under his own supervision that he might know just what went into its construction.

P. George Gow, who recently returned from a trip to El Dorado county in his Knox, had a rather stormy outing. In many parts of the road he worked his way through mud and water which in many places reached as far as the axles. Mr. Gow has just received a new Knox from the National Automobile Company.

Miss Kate Dillon runs her White touring car herself, and is becoming quite an expert.

When Sir David Edwards, London's ex-Lord Mayor, was here lately, he showed himself quite an enthusiastic automobilist. With his wife, three sons and daughter, he saw most of the sights here through the auto medium, being convoyed in a Winton touring car by Messrs. Rosenfeld, Peabody and Weldon.

The Mobile Carriage Company has just secured the block on Golden Gate avenue, Gough street, Jefferson Park and Elm avenue, and will erect an automobile house and garage to be probably the largest in the United States. It will have a frontage of one hundred and thirty-seven and one-half feet on Golden Gate avenue, one hundred and twenty feet on Gough street and Jefferson Park and one hundred and thirty-seven and one-half feet on Elm avenue. The building is to be one story high and will be constructed as an automobile house exclusively. The structure is to be imposing and artistic in every way, which will be in keeping with its excellent location. The furnishings will include ladies' reception room, gentlemen's reception room, club room for the employes and a spacious office. It will be completed for occupancy by January fifteenth. The Mobile Carriage Company, which purchased the interests of the "Mobile" Company of America on the coast, has taken up the gasoline business aggressively, having the coast agencies for the Pierce Arrow touring car (French car), Pierce stanhope and Northern runabout. In addition to its great house in San Francisco, it is about to open up a branch house in Los Angeles. In order that its service may be as nearly perfect as possible, it employed experts in the East to superintend the gasoline repair department and garage department. There is probably no automobile house in the country representing as much money as the Mobile Carriage Company. The directors are J. A. Marsh, president, Livingston Jenks, Heber C. Tilden, Charles K. Harley and Major Charles L. Tilden.

The Pioneer Automobile Company is in receipt of a letter from the Olds Motor Works at Detroit, Michigan, which reads as follows:

"We have just been advised that our two Oldsmobiles, which finished the New York, Buffalo, Cleveland, Pittsburg Endurance Run on time, have each been awarded a first-class certificate. As one of these machines is the famous transcontinental Oldsmobile, it certainly demonstrates again the reliability of our popular runabout, and also shows the public that while our machines were the lowest in price and horse power of any machines which finished in the run, yet they did the work as satisfactorily as the more expensive cars. Unlike last year's run, the rules allowed almost any speed and the weather was worse, both of which worked against the low-powered automobiles. Nevertheless, we finished at Pittsburg on time and the repairs on the Oldsmobiles were very slight compared with those on some of the other machines. This statement will give you a clear idea of just what results the Oldsmobile did accomplish and also be of interest to prospective customers."

This week the Pioneer Automobile Company will receive from the factory of the Locomobile Company of America at Bridgeport, Connecticut, one of the new 1904 model two cylinder nine horse power Locomobiles. This machine is similar to the one recently purchased by Mr. A. A. Moore, Jr., with the exception that it has but two cylinders and is nine horse power. It is a very popular machine throughout the East. Mr. Kearney of Fresno is the proud purchaser of a four-cylinder Locomobile which is due to arrive here some time during the present week.

An interesting trip was that of Dr. John T. Jones. He took his White stanhope to Colfax and back and the rough roads proved no obstacle to progress, the machine ploughing through the mud in excellent shape.

The J. A. Millans and their daughter, Mrs. McMurray, have joined the van of autoists. They have a handsome Stevens-Duryea machine.

In San Diego they are anxiously looking for the new gasoline cars that are to give an hourly service to the beach. The railroad management, it is said, will replace the station taken away from the eastern part of the beach.

The National Automobile Company has received the first 1904 double-cylinder air cooling touring car. This car has been purchased by P. George Gow of San Rafael.

The Toledo which did such wonderful work at Ingleside did even better at Los Angeles, where it won the Shreve cup, the Chanslor cup and the Stimpson cup, and a cup offered by the Automobile Club of Southern California. The time was even better than that made in San Francisco. The big four-cylinder reeled off five miles in the race for the Shreve cup in 5:58 1-5 and in the race for the Chanslor cup negotiated the five miles in 5:52. This was the best official time next to Oldfield's, and is the fastest time yet made in the United States by a stock machine. But the Toledo did better than this in the pursuit race, rolling off five miles in 5:46 1-4. This time while not officially announced was taken by L. P. Lowe, vice-president of the Automobile Club of California.

The four-cylinder Toledo which made such a creditable showing at Ingleside and Los Angeles has been sold to E. W. Davies, a prominent lumber man of that city.

The National Automobile Company has received a 1904 delivery wagon made by the Knox Automobile Company. Like the other machines made by this firm, it is cooled by air and no doubt will prove very popular in San Francisco.

Renting of automobiles is said to have been highly profitable in New York lately. One concern states that its receipts from this source in a single day amounted to about two hundred dollars.

Mr. L. P. Lowe has ordered a new four-cylinder Pope-Toledo touring car from the National Automobile Company.

George P. Fuller has gone to St. Helena in his Winton.

The Jeune Siecle Girl

The things I do and the tales I hear
Are more risque than they were last year.
Some time ago I forgot to blush
Or check broad tale with a cautious "Hush!"
'Tis not ma mere who listens now,
But ma fille, too—when the fates allow.
I go with men to Pinero's play,
And laugh when the scenes are more than gay.
The tree of knowledge long since was bare
'Tis an awful chestnut, too, I swear.
Life's a woeful bore, I am so blase,
Not a new sensation for me today!
With life a bore, why then pretend
That I care a rap how I meet my end?
There's nothing on earth for me to know—
Then welcome hell—for there I'll go!

Stories Old and New

A Kate Field Story

Kate Field once related how she was sitting in a railway car just behind two farmers, who, to pass the time on their journey, bought a New York Tribune of the trainboy. One of them slowly put on his spectacles and slowly prepared to read the news aloud to his companion. It happened that the paper had been folded wrong side out, so that the advertisements were uppermost, and the venerable man was soon regaling his companion with a long dissertation on the merits of Dr. Jabberway's Celebrated All Sufficient Specific, which cured everything from chronic rheumatism to water blisters. He toiled patiently on, pronouncing the Latin names after a system exclusively his own, and devouring with unconcealed wonder all the elaborate descriptions of the internal economy of humankind, while his listening partner sat with bent head and mouth agape, nodding approval from time to time. When the last line of the advertisement was finished the reader laid down the sheet, and the eyes of the two friends met. Both were for a few seconds too deeply impressed to speak. Then the one who had been silent all the while found voice enough to gasp:

"Wa'al, I vow! That feller Greeley does know a heap, naow, don't he?"

Some Beecher Stories

In 1859 Mr. Beecher preached at Lenox, Mass.

"Oh, dear," exclaimed Miss Heron, the actress, who was present, "I did hope, when I left New York, I should leave the stage behind me."

When Park Benjamin was invited to attend Plymouth church and complained of not knowing the way Mr. Beecher told the poet to take the ferry and follow the crowd.

"I would come," replied Benjamin, "only that I make it an invariable rule never to go to any place of amusement on Sunday."

In 1860 Mr. Beecher was invited by the Mercantile Library Association of St. Louis to lecture, but with the understanding that he should "eschew all matters pertaining to politics and religion." The characteristic reply was:

"I am too much of a patriot to eschew the one and too good a Christian to neglect the other," and in closing, "hoped that before long the young men of St. Louis would be able to listen, without shrinking, to the free speech of an honest man."

When Mr. Beecher tried to stop running horse-cars in Brooklyn on Sundays, for the sake of the conductors and drivers, he unbeknown questioned a conductor, who replied:

"If that sanctimonious hypocrite Beecher would shut up his establishment the thing could be done."

Mr. Beecher inquired of some boys crying papers:

"What's the news tonight?"

"Oh!" said one of the urchins, "give me three cents and I'll show you!"

Presidential Candidates

Now that Mr. Cleveland is no longer to be considered as a presidential possibility, having asserted that his determination not to run again is "unalterable and conclusive," a lively interest is being taken once more in the prospects of certain prominent Democrats who are known to cherish the hope of succeeding Mr. Roosevelt. Judge Parker is probably more seriously boomed than any of the others, and it would not be difficult for the two factions of the Democracy—the Clevelanders and the Bryanites—to unite on him, for he is a mild-mannered gentleman who has never excited the hatred of powerful politicians. Indeed he has never "taken sides" in any very bitter controversy. He is simply a Democrat of the old school, who has always been eloquent in his espousal of fundamentals. Consequently he is somewhat colorless. Senator Gorman has substantial backing, but it is thought that he is too well known as a practical politician to be considered seriously as a Presidential candidate. William J. Bryan is suggesting available men every little while, but none that he names has more than a local reputation. William R. Hearst is gradually winning recognition, but only as the champion of Organized Labor. The probability of the labor unions dominating the Democratic convention is remote, and therefore Mr. Hearst's chances are not very bright.

A Past That Shrieks

Though the Hanna boom is receiving considerable nourishment these days and the enemies of Roosevelt in the Republican party continue to depreciate his chance of nomination at the hands of the National Convention, the probability of his being turned down is exceedingly remote. If some man other than Hanna were being boomed Roosevelt's prospects would appear less bright. The Ohio Senator is greatly admired as a politician and a financier, and he wields tremendous influence in the councils of his party, but he would not be a strong candidate for the Presidency. He is far from being representative of the highest type of citizenship. He is a superb organizer, and he is skilled in the art of separating the Wall street magnates from their money for campaign purposes, but he has a past that would supply unlimited food for the moralizers if he were to aspire to the exalted station of Chief Executive of this country. Mr. Hanna is a man without ideals. He is a practical politician, a successful exponent of all the nefarious tricks that are conducive to success in the game. He won considerable prestige by grooming McKinley for the several offices occupied by that distinguished citizen, but the one blot on the career of the late President came from the contaminating touch of the political boss of Ohio.

Our Able Diplomat

It is amusing to read, in the despatches, the criticisms of some of our cow-county statesmen in Washington, of Secretary of State Hay's "dangerous policy" in connection with the preparations of this Government to construct the Panama Canal. If there is one circumstance in connection with the complications growing out of the canal controversy for which we should be thankful, it is that John Hay is at the head of the State Department. Moreover it is very fortunate that Mr. Roosevelt has implicit confidence in the judgment of Mr. Hay. The most accomplished among the veteran statesmen of Europe have the highest respect for the diplomacy of John Hay, for they regard him as one of the greatest diplomatists of the day. The fact is that few of his contemporaries have had the training by which he was fitted for the important duties which he is now performing so satisfactorily and with such credit to the Administration. His experience in the affairs of the nation dates from his young manhood when he occupied the responsible position of Private Secretary to President Lincoln. He served in that capacity four years and was President Lincoln's confidential medium of communication with the War Department. Since then he has been Consul-General at Paris, Charge d'Affaires at Vienna, Secretary of the American Legation at Madrid, Assistant Secretary of State in the Hayes Administration, Ambassador to Great Britain and Secretary of State in President McKinley's cabinet. There can be no question of John Hay's proficiency in statecraft, or of his exalted and inflexible Americanism. There should be no misgivings as to his wisdom, his judgment or his temperament, for they have been vindicated by his achievements in the field of diplomacy. He it was who paved the way for the acquisition of the Panama Canal by negotiating the repeal of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and to him is attributed the safeguarding of China from partition. He is the champion of the Open Door and the man above all others to whom the credit is due for perfecting the proposals for the Hague Arbitration treaty, to which we are indebted for the settlement of the Alaskan boundary dispute. There is no likelihood of Mr. Hay's embroiling us in foreign complications, nor is there danger of serious friction with Columbia unless the demagogues at Washington of the Livernash type succeed in their efforts to create the impression that we took an unfair advantage of a weaker country.

The Greatest of Our Glories

The California Outdoor Art League, in its efforts to secure the passage of a bill in Congress for the preservation of the California Big Trees, should receive the support and co-operation of every public-spirited citizen. The two most vital internal questions in this country today are the forest and water problems. A great deal of attention has been given lately to the subject of irrigation and the reclamation of our arid waste, but quite as vital as this question and in many ways closely allied to it is the consideration of the preservation and protection of our forests.

In foreign countries, especially in France and Germany, the government has long been alert in its supervision of the woodland tracts. But we of this country, proud of our great forest reaches, yet blind to the fact that the ruthless hand of commerce is rapidly reducing their extent, sit idly by, nursing the delusion that, so broad is our forest domain, we can well afford to be generous, and to yield all that is being consumed for economic purposes and through negligence. Each year there is pitiable destruction of one of our greatest glories, and each year the necessity of its preservation is more and more apparent. The Calaveras groves of Big Trees, whose majestic beauty is unique and world-renowned, are the property of private individuals and are in danger of destruction. Lumbering is rapidly sweeping them off. These extraordinary trees should be purchased by the Government and converted into a public park for the use and pleasure of the people of the world. It is to that end that the members of the Outdoor Art League are working and it is to be hoped that they will meet with success.

When Dix Became Sensational

Dr. Morgan Dix, rector of old Trinity, is now recognized as one of the most learned and conservative clergymen in the country. He never courts public applause, but usually confines his pulpit talks to discussion of purely spiritual affairs. But the other day he dealt with the social tendencies, in a sermon, and became positively sensational. For instance, he expressed a desire to know what could be done "to stop married people from putting away each other as soon as they got tired of each other, and adding to the sin of unfaithfulness the fresh sin of rushing into the arms of the partners of their guilt." Dr. Dix probably had in mind the recent marriage of Mrs. Mary Isabella Kemp and Hollis H. Hunnewell, though of course it would have been libelous for him to intimate that in that case there had been any "rushing into the arms of the partners of their guilt." There have been numerous instances of such rushing among Dr. Dix's wealthy parishioners, and consequently his language could apply to a number of people. However, the haste of Mrs. Kemp was hardly in good form. She was divorced from Kemp in the morning and she married Hunnewell at noon. Mr. Hunnewell's first wife obtained a divorce from him early this year and a few months later she was married in London to John S. Tooker. Dr. Dix complained of other social evils, such as "class alienation, the angry discontent of the poor, the growth of luxuries, riotous living, education without religion, the reckless squandering of money on pleasure and pride, the insecurity of life through contempt for the law, and the steady decline of womanhood from its old ideals through copying the ways and invading the sphere of men." Evidently Dr. Dix would wish to introduce a reign of economy, but we doubt whether that would improve conditions. Better would it be to make it impossible for some men to grow ridiculously rich. The generosity of the many does no harm. As for the decline of womanhood, we are unaware of any such catastrophe. The old ideals of womanhood are mediæval. When woman ceased to regard marriage as her sole reputable means of livelihood her gradual exaltation commenced. She has never declined since. Her degradation was at its worst when she was subject to the necessity of marrying the first man from whom she received a proposal.

Disputes Among Christians

The question of Churchly authority which has interested Episcopalians for many years has assumed a new phase in Massachusetts. The Episcopalians have long been indignant that their claim to authority by right of descent from the Apostles should be questioned, but in Massachusetts it is the Congregationalists who are engaged in dispute, and controversy is between the Unitarian and the Trinitarian Congregationalists of Plymouth, as to which is the legitimate descendant and heir of the Pilgrims, not alone spiritually but also historically. It's a curious bone of contention even in this age of theological unrest. What spiritual blessing the old Pilgrims had to bequeath it is difficult to conceive. And what benefit a church is to derive from being acknowledged the historical heir of the Pilgrims, is a question we are unable to answer. The Congregationalists "on the stern and rockbound coast" ought to be able to put in their time to much better advantage than in quarreling over the right of descent. In New York the Episcopalians are in dispute over the subject of miracles. That involves a question of dogma, and its discussion is profitable to all Christians. The question of miracles is a stumbling block for the new theology, and there are many churchmen who are reluctant to discuss them. When forced to do so they seek to give a figurative explanation. In doubting miracles or seeking to explain them they strike at the very foundation of Christianity, which had its origin in a miracle. When they accept the essential miracle of the Incarnation they should have no hesitancy in accepting the others. However, it is not unusual for theologians to prove themselves illogical. The exponents of the new theology are afflicted with a timidity which would lead them to infidelity were they to follow their arguments to their logical conclusions.

Fanaticism and Worse

A Terre Haute justice recently fined a man for gathering corn on Sunday and thereby endangering the peace of the day. The defendant explained that he was gathering feed for his hungry horses, but the magistrate was not to be appeased. According to his interpretation, the horses evidently had no business to be hungry. The Terre Taute justice belongs in the same category with the Australian preacher who is expounding to his congregation that the drouth from which the country has suffered is a visible manifestation of the wrath of God aroused by the people who have not supported the churches. Time was when people could be frightened and bulldozed by such pronunciamentos from pulpit pounders, but the time has long since gone by. Preachers who take such ground are fully two hundred years behind their generation and only make themselves ridiculous, yet there is never a calamity but what some one of them is heard from. After the Chicago Fair, when some of the buildings were in course of demolition, a number of workmen were burned to death, and a "divine" made the occurrence the subject of a discourse in which he pretended to see the displeasure of God because the Fair was open on Sunday. Another made a steamer disaster a vehicle for the exposition of his theory that God was angry at the impiety of Sunday travel, and so on. When there is nothing but this sort of twaddle to be listened to from some pulpits, small wonder that their occupants complain of lack of patronage.

Our Degenerate Public School System

The school question seems to be taking the place of the servant problem as a matter of newspaper discussion in the East. San Francisco is just beginning to discover what is an old story now to the rest of the country, that fancy fads are not a valid substitute for the old-fashioned substantials, and that the originality developed in orthography from emancipation from the spelling-book, and picturesque individuality in multiplication, detract somewhat from the practical availability of graduates when they are introduced to a workaday world. Some thirty years ago the public school was exalted because it was then discovered that the education received there was superior to that of private institutions, and families which had never before patronized the free schools, choosing to regard them as in a measure charitable institutions, awakened to the fact that making wax flowers and hair wreaths and copying landscapes in soft pencil were not, on the whole, either useful or especially ornamental achievements, while the boys who were not urged to overstudy, lest they should take offense and petition to be removed to some less strenuous institution and thereby deplete the pedagogical income, were easily outdone by those who had no choice but to learn. Today the picture is reversed. The public school is the home of the fad and the public school pupil dictates to his teacher, with the alternative of an investigation and a loss of position. The consequence is that today the private school is once more in the ascendant. Not only do the military academies flourish, and the fashionable girls' schools report full attendance, but the parochial schools have all the pupils they can accommodate, a large proportion of them Protestant children, sent there to escape the silly nonsense with which the public school course is overloaded. A New York merchant whose firm employs many boys, and who is not actuated by religious prejudice, says that they take their young assistants from amongst the parochial school lads because they find them better prepared for usefulness. They are well grounded in the essential branches of education, accurate in figures and orthography, better in penmanship, and more tractable and obedient. They can do the thing they are told to do without haggling over it, though they are not experts in weaving shoestring watchguards and designing book covers, which no one wants them to do. The public school was once the place for the poor man's children to get a practical education which fitted them for facing the world, while wealthy parents, who expected to keep their girls at home and supply their boys with capital for a start in life, patronized the private institutions. Now it is only the wealthy who can afford to waste the time at public schools, and day by day we see the parents of moderate means paying for the tuition of their children where there is some chance of their gaining an education which will have some bearing on practical affairs.

The Servant Problem

The college graduate who went into domestic service and then put her experience into book form may not have done much to settle the vexed subject, but she has at least thrown new light upon some of its phases. The main trouble with the servant problem is similar to that of the matrimonial, it can not be settled by generalizing, but resolves itself at last into the personal equation. Next to the family relations of husband and wife, parent and child, that of mistress and maid is the closest possible. In the circumscribed area of domestic life the polish assumed for the outside world is laid by, the unscrupulous, the unreasonable and the nagging show themselves as they are. Loss of social caste is supposed to be the main drawback of servant life, but there are others more serious in their nature. "Servants, obey your masters" is one of the oldest of injunctions. From ancient tradition a servitor is supposed to have no personal independence. Her whole time, with the exception of an occasional afternoon off, belongs to her employer. To be sure, we have got a little beyond the days of good Samuel Pepys, when servants were subjected to personal chastisement, and when Mrs. Pepys could call her maids out of bed at one o'clock in the morning to do the washing. Neither are a man's servants, men and women, any longer classed with his children as dependents. Still, of all occupations that of the domestic worker is least characterized by personal liberty. A servant must conform to the will of her employer in hours, mode of living, method of work, and not seldom in matters of dress and individual bearing. She is confined at all hours night and day to the field of her work ,and is always under orders. It is this consideration, more than any other, which impels the women who toils to factory labor rather than domestic. When her hours are over she is for a time at least her own mistress, and can live a small part of her daily life among other scenes and surroundings. Her taskmaster in shop or office may be a hard customer, but beyond a certain point he is unable to dictate. Some small portion of her life belongs to herself, and in the main this is what renders her position superior to that of the domestic servant. There is much talk among advanced club-women of elevating the status of domestic labor. We can not look for any sensible improvement until women in general govern their households with more of reason and less of whim. Nerves and tempers have all too much play in the scheme of things, and perhaps always will have until some people learn that home is not the place to display their most disagreeable qualities.

BY HARRY COWELL

Life is emotional rather than intellectual: we live not so much by logic as by love. The feelings are fateful, determinative of almost all our actions, deciding finally the question of failure or success. In the heart dwelleth destiny. It is science itself, cold and critical science, that is nowadays putting down the mighty intellect from its seat and exalting the humble and meek emotions. To have intense feelings of finest quality, to enjoy sentiment at its height, to be capable of experiencing the extremes of pleasure and of pain presupposes not a little of what is known as mental development; but the arrogant brain is far too apt to obtrude itself everywhere and needs to be kept in its place. The foreground of life belongs to feeling.

In the depths of our beings we are all—every last man of us, even the most matter-of-fact—on the hunt for ecstasy, which we look to find, this one in love, that one in art. We all, too, have our supreme moments; moments which admit of no repetition; which cause the common days to recede into the background of memory and become mere setting; moments which make us say: Life can go no farther, no higher: it is time to die. These moments, however, are prime factors in making a surpassing of themselves possible.

To certain generous minds, no price, how exorbitant soever, is too high to pay for a golden emotion. For such souls, to pass through existence with bovine placidity is not enough. Fain would they be human, and feel. To feel is to live. A day without emotion is a dies non. But to feel is to suffer. They suffer, and their silence, no less than their passionate protests and outcries of righteous indignation, is a call to the race of man to come up higher. The suffering of the noble is in itself the noblest, the most significant, sermon possible to preach.

In order thoroughly to enjoy the ecstacies of what may be called the qualitative life, it is necessary to maintain for years an exquisite attitude of mind towards a world with which one is naturally discontented. Supreme moments are possible only where there are mood and atmosphere. In this quest of golden states of consciousness cynicism in any form is fatal.

It is not always by means of love alone or art alone that one attains moments of the highest quality; more often it is by means of both combined. Somehow—perhaps because in art as in love sex is supreme; I do not pretend to decide so delicate a question—somehow the emotions caused by love and those caused by art mingle readily. Especially is this true where love and music meet. Shakespeare, noting this, makes one of his characters speak of music as "the food of love." It is more. Music appeals directly to the emotions and but indirectly to the intellect. It does not bore you with its brains. Its perfect blending of matter and manner affords a never-to-be-attained but ever-to-be-striven-for ideal of literature and of life. Well we know its magic, you and I. It awakens memories of impossible delights experienced in worlds that never were; it makes the listener homesick for native lands he never knew; he weeps over sorrows that no man ever suffered, and smiles because of beatitudes which no mortal will ever enjoy. All that is vaguely sweet and mysterious moving is music's. It holds strange dreams. It's the wonder of beauty and the terror. Its messages may be interpreted in as many ways as there are human triumphs and tragedies. But enough—music alone may speak adequately of music.

Now take love's hour, the dusk of evening, and love's season, spring, and for choice let a new moon be showing just a hand high above a not too distant hill. Into this atmosphere put a man and a maid natives of the land of dreams, lovers. Seat them together, hand in hand, on a couch by an open window. A friend, beloved of both, makes twilight music on a piano. His back is toward the lovers. They excuse it. Simultaneously at every particularly beautiful passage there is a convulsive clasping of hands. But if these two love music and each other well, it is, I take it, high time for you and me, commonplace folk and outsiders that we are, to retire. Have we not reason to hope that before the coming of the unromantic gaslight our young friends may have experienced one of those supreme moments which fate owes to us all?

Are our lovers of a literary turn of mind and fond of God's goodly out-of-doors? A favorite book, a lonely flowerful spot overlooking a sunlit sea, hills in the distance, hills green and gold and haunted with shadows. The author, of course, has written of love,—what else? It is the woman who reads. Her voice is low and musical. If there are pauses other than those called for by the punctuation, what of it, pray? They, too, if I mistake not, may ere sundown have known emotions to match the blue heavens above them; emotions sublime as sunlight aslant upon the sea.

Every one of the rare feelings which art, by presenting beauty to us under her manifold aspects, occasions, tends to combine with and perfect the feelings peculiar to love. The face of beauty is never so beautiful as when lovers behold it together. The delights of art are doubly delightful when shared with one we love. To the greatest of passions music can add; and Cupid counts literature among the most faithful and potent of his allies. Many a painter and sculptor has forgotten the model to remember the woman; many a model has forgotten the painter or the sculptor to remember the man. Most romantic of all romances are those of art.

Do you estimate life in heart-beats? Do you desire to live from golden moment to golden moment? Call upon two mighty names and a little conjunction.

For Law and Order

BY T. F. B.

On Market street, a short distance east of Sixth, one day last week, my attention was directed to some rough looking men standing at the entrance of a cloak store. They were stern visaged and of somewhat ferocious aspect. By their manner they seemed to be prepared to challenge anybody to enter the store. So resentful was the frown that darkened the countenance of each, such evil did their presence forebode, that no timid person would care to enter the store through such an ominous gauntlet. Pacing the edge of the sidewalk, to and fro, were several other men, of equally unprepossessing appearance, who proclaimed in angry tones and foreign dialect that somebody was the "enemy of labor," and that there was an"unfair store" in the neighborhood. Instinctively I looked for the police, but none of the guardians of the peace was in sight. Yet here were men on a public thoroughfare, who were acting in a manner calculated to cause a breach of the peace. Their bearing and their tone were eloquent of passion, and they were plainly engaged in inspiring prospective customers of an American citizen, engaged in a legitimate business, with awe and apprehension. The proprietor of the store must have been sorely tempted to take the law into his own hands.

Presently two young women of the class that imparts atmosphere to the tenderloin happened on the scene, and made straight for the cloak store. They ignored the frowns at either side of the entrance. They heeded not the threatening tones of the boycotters. But scarcely had they passed the portals when one of the bullies hissed, "Scab!"

Like a flash one of the young women turned on the man from whose lips the epithet had escaped.

"You — — cur," she exclaimed. "You — — —. Don't you dare to speak to me, you — — —."

It was a speech that abounded in picturesque oaths, and it had the desired effect. The bully skulked away, and his companions were mute. It was not an edifying episode, but though the vocabulary of the young woman was shockingly forceful, one could not quite repress the feeling of satisfaction over the crushing of the pestiferous representative of organized labor.

I am not an apostate from the cause of labor, but I seriously deprecate the evils that threaten the disruption of the whole labor movement. My sympathies have always been with the workingmen who have organized to compel recognition of their rights. My sentiments have undergone no change. My sympathy, however, is not with those labor leaders who have revolted the public mind and goaded it into asserting its disapproval of the methods employed to disturb society and create industrial unrest. Labor combines have become as odious as those of capital. They have alienated public sentiment by laying down rules, making demands and resorting to neasures that would make the eunuchs in the Sultan's harem rise in rebellion. The Market street incident which came under my observation is but a mild illustration of the tactics of the men who seek to compel acquiescence in all that concerns the furtherance of their interests. They should know that American citizens will never bow to the dictates of any one man, or set of men, not properly constituted authorities, who assume the right to act as such. All fair-minded men believe that the rights of the laboring man should be upheld, but they are not in favor of making those rights a pretext for throwing organized human society into chaos.

When labor troubles cannot be settled by arbitration the labor unions have no right to resort to force. But they have done so in almost every strike of any importance that has taken place in this country. Their leaders advocate peaceful measures but wink at violence, and the cowardly press dare not tell the truth. The American people object to being bulldozed, and the time is approaching when the exponents of the sanguinary boycott will learn that they have exhausted popular patience. In the recent street car strike in Chicago the bludgeon and the pistol were freely used, and it was only when the Mayor allowed a few hundred policemen to stand between the brickbats and the nobility of toil, that the strike leaders agreed to submit to arbitration.

As a result of labor troubles business has been seriously deranged all over the country. The building trade is in a particularly depressed condition. Wages and the cost of material have risen so enormously that comparatively few people care to make improvements. The work of erecting another million dollar building at Stanford University has been postponed on account of the unreasonableness of the demand of labor. The people who purchased the property at Fourth and Market streets from the Mackay estate are deterred from spending several millions, for the same cause, and many other enterprising citizens are waiting for the reaction. Conservative people are afraid to improve vacant property. They prefer to invest their money in standard securities.

But the tyranny of organized labor is soon to be met with resistance from organized industry. The signs of the times indicate that the encroachments of union labor have reached the limit, and that the professional agitator has had his day. The workingman is soon to learn that he is not of the class that constitutes the great majority by which this Republic is governed. When it was determined that this should be a government of the people and by the people, there was no intention of bestowing special privileges either on Capital or on Labor. The masses are allied with neither class, and they have rights which all others are bound to respect though they are slow in asserting them. They constitute the bulk of American citizenship. They are patriotic, and they believe that this Government is wise enough and powerful enough to regulate both Capital and Labor. They are not given to yawping horrendously, but they have faith in American institutions, and they believe in the maintenance of law and order. The workingmen of the unions, flushed with the success that attended their efforts to enlist public sympathy, encouraged by the concessions which employers were forced to make, conscious of their strength and arrogant in the enjoyment of the fruits of their victories, became so unreasonable in their demands, and the rogues, demagogues and bullies by whom they were led became so insolent, that at length the indignation and alarm of the unorganized masses have been aroused. As a consequence the Citizens' Industrial Association has sprung into existence, with the avowed purpose of resisting the tyranny of the labor unions. It is representative of the employing interests and of the good citizenship of the country, and though it does not profess to be an enemy of organized labor conducted on lawful and beneficial lines, it is unalterably opposed to the illegal and unreasonable methods employed by the working men of the unions in the enforcement of their demands. The Industrial Association is to devote itself to the maintenance of law and order, and these sentences in its platform are expressive of the spirit that animates its members: "Since labor organizations exist for the apparent purpose of defying law and common sense, and are able to intimidate and influence men and municipal authorities, there is no alternative left to those who desire to preserve bearable conditions in our body politic than that of forming counter organizations. It is only through the machinery of organization that we hope to exercise a potent and salutary influence over public thought and the conduct of public affairs, to the end that the rights of American citizenship can be assured to free and independent labor, the rights of property maintained and legislation of a socialistic nature prevented from becoming law."

The Industrial Association has a branch in this city and it is growing rapidly. Its influence is being extended throughout the length and breadth of the land, and it has already secured legislation in some States calculated to render the sting of the walking delegate innocuous, and to safeguard both life and property when strikers are exercising their inalienable right of ceasing their toil. Perhaps in time it will be discovered that organized employers and organized labor may be polite, conciliatory and generous to one another, and that they may adjust their difficulties without jeopardizing the rights of others.

The Saunterer

The Crocker Home Muddle

The servile sycophants and transparent trucklers of the evening press weren't long in determining the question as to whom they should blame for the miscarriage of the plans of the patronesses of the Children's Hospital . Mrs. Walter Martin being a daughter of the Henry T. Scotts, and a daughter-in-law of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, the course for the journalistic toadies to take was obvious. The George Crockers are living far away in New York and their contempt for our snobocracy is overpowering. Indeed, there is no very strong bond of affection between the George Crockers and the Will Crockers, and moreover one of our social leaders has never quite recovered from the snubbing that she received some years ago at the hands of the George Crockers. This same social leader never forgets the side on which her social bread is buttered, and she therefore has great respect for the Martin-Scott clan. Incidentally it should be stated that she more than inspires much of the social gossip that is circulated by the local press. Under the circumstances it is easy to comprehend the attitude of a section of the local press toward the George Crockers for declining to endorse Henry T. Scott's general invitation to the public to inspect their home.

Scott's Generosity

Henry T. Scott has made some tremendously bad "breaks" in his time, but never did he so conspicuously betray his bad manners as when he gave his daughter permission to hold a reception in aid of the Children's Hospital, in the Crocker residence. Henry T. Scott, be it understood, has no more authority than I have over the Crocker residence. His assumption of authority was consistent only with the bumptiousness of his nature. In giving his daughter permission to take possession of the home, he pretended to act as the representative of the heirs of Colonel Fred Crocker, but those heirs do not assert any interest in the property. They at one time owned some personal property in the house but it has long since been removed. But even though he did have some authority in his capacity as executor, it would nevertheless have been presumptuous for him to throw open the doors to the public. Moreover, it would have been a reckless thing to do for that old Crocker home is filled with priceless treasures that could very easily be stolen. There is in one of the rooms a cabinet filled with a very valuable collection of old snuff boxes. Another contains beautifully carved Chinese ivories, and there is another containing gold and silver cloisonne ware. There are valuable ornaments all through the house. The gold spike which was driven in the last rail of the Central Pacific Railroad is there together with the hammer with which it was driven, and numerous other trinkets and relics are within easy reach of visitors. Yet Henry T. Scott was willing that anybody who paid the price should have access to these treasures. Surely Mr. Scott would not have been willing to have taken any chances if he believed himself to be the lawful custodian of that property.

Why Will Crocker Assented

I believe that if George Crocker had been consulted he would have given permission to the opening of his home in the interest of the Children's Hospital, for he is a charitable man whose donations to local charities every month amount to a considerable sum. But if he were to grant the desired privilege he would no doubt instruct his representatives to cover the carpets with canvas and take precautions for the safeguarding of his property. The first news he received of the generosity of Mr. Scott was sent by the housekeeper who was surprised by mechanics who visited the mansion to erect booths therein. Mr. Scott is reported to have said that he consulted Will Crocker about opening the house to the public and that the latter gave his consent. I have been informed that he merely asked Will Crocker if he had any objection, and of course the latter declared that he had none, having no interest in the property. However Will Crocker kindly donated the use of his own home which had been dismantled. There were no carpets on the floor and no curtains on the windows, and there was nothing in sight to tempt a looter.

Typical Hospitality

The action of Henry T. Scott was characteristic. We had an illustration of the genuine Scott hospitality when President McKinley visited the city some years ago. Mr. Scott threw open his own home on that occasion, to the President, won a lot of social prestige by doing so, and later on confessed himself an innkeeper and pronounced his own home a boarding-house by charging the cost of entertaining the Nation's chief against the fund raised by the Citizens' Committee to defray the expenses of the festivities in the President's honor. As a public spirited citizen Mr. Scott is unique. In doing the spectacular at other people's expense he is without a peer. His action in the matter of the Crocker home may result in steps being taken by George Crocker to ascertain if any of his relatives do assert any interest in the property. When Mrs. Charles Crocker died the heirs distributed the estate among themselves in accordance with memoranda left by her in lieu of a will. The heirs abided by her wishes as they understood them. George Crocker has always claimed the old home and his claim has never been disputed. However, I believe there has been some friction in the family. By the terms of Charles Crocker's will, his son George's share was left in trust with the proviso that he should not inherit unless he quit drinking. He was to be allowed twelve years in which to reform, but he would have to abstain from the use of liquor five consecutive years before he could claim his share of the estate. George Crocker was a rollicking blade, with an enormous thirst for champagne. The prospect of losing several millions of dollars seemed to have no effect on him.

A Thirst Repressed

His thirst gave promise of remaining unquenchable for an indefinite period. The other heirs were confident that at the end of twelve years they would be entitled to distribute his share among themselves. And meanwhile the millions held in trust were drawing interest at six per cent. One day after seven years of indulgence George Crocker pulled himself together and figured out that if he quit drinking then and there, and didn't open another bottle for five consecutive years he could win his inheritance and have fifteen or twenty minutes to spare. He hesitated, for the prospect of going five years without stimulants was appalling. Then he calculated the interest at six per cent on the trust fund, and the figures were as exhilarating as an absinthe frappe on the morning after. He resolved, in the parlance of the cocktail route, to take to the water wagon, and thereafter the other Crocker heirs took a feverish interest in their brother's struggle against temptation. But it wasn't a hard struggle, for George Crocker is a sensible, level-headed fellow. It was his congeniality, a trait, by the way, uncommon in the Charles Crocker family, that had developed the champagne thirst, but when he quit drinking to win his inheritance, there was never any danger of his falling by the wayside. But naturally his reformation aroused the keen interest of the other heirs. His failure would be greatly advantageous to them, and I have heard it intimated that there was not great rejoicing among them when he came under the wire winning by a nose, but the intimation was probably born of a cynical estimate of human nature. However their relations at this time are more than a trifle formal.

A Study in Degeneracy

Alexander Garnett would be an excellent study for the atavists. He appears to be degenerate in the scientific meaning of the word, not as applied to every criminal or every one with low instincts, but as good stock run out. The elder Garnett boys are all dead now, but they were studies in various forms of evil. Louis Garnett, the father, took two of his sons East once upon a time, and put them in school, but he was scarcely back in San Francisco when the school authorities notified their father to take them away. "Tip" Garnett was put on the training ship Jamestown, which was not like the naval training ships at Goat Island, but an adjunct of the House of Refuge. "Tip" would have been sent to the latter place had his people not been of the wealthy class. Some one of the training officers notified Mr. Garnett that he had better take his son home, for the boy would kill some one if he were not killed himself in the attempt. He was said to be beyond discipline and neither kindness nor cursing had any effect on him.

the deftness of a Belasco, the finesse of a Pinero and the genius for atmosphere of a Fitch, he levanted to Chicago where they appreciate the culture peculiar to the masses. He had a trunk full of plays, and he took the lid off in the presence of the manager of the New American theatre. The first bit of manuscript that caught the managerial eye contained Ulrich's very latest drammer, "The Man from Nevada." The play was produced and created a sensation in the gallery. Now Ulrich is busy answering letters of inquiry from New York managers. By way of keeping his hand in he is earning a salary on the Chicago Examiner. Fred Lawrence, who is managing editor of that paper and doing splendid work, elevated Ulrich to the position of "Feature Editor" of the Sunday supp. and the probability is that the indefatigable playwright will work off a little of his excess baggage in the dramatic line through the columns of the paper. From the same correspondent who acquainted me with the success of Mr. Ulrich, I learn that Helen Dare (Mrs. Brough), formerly of the San Francisco Examiner, is now on Hearst's Chicago paper, and that Arthur Clark, formerly of the Chronicle but for three years city editor of the Chicago Examiner, was sent to Los Angeles to act in a similar capacity on the infant yellow journal.

Why Wheeler Eulogized Syle

Though Professor Du Pont Syle is dead he is not forgotten by his friends. They believe that he was the victim of revenge, and that it was the machinations of a petty and malicious spirit that compassed his downfall and drove him prematurely to the grave. It has been frequently hinted that President Benjamin Ide Wheeler of the State University was the steadfast nemesis of Professor Syle, and that he had thrown obstacles in the latter's way to prevent him from obtaining employment. But when Syle passed away President Wheeler took occasion to deliver a memorial eulogy on the deceased which caused many people to conclude that the university President had been maligned. Now the friends of Syle are saying that Wheeler delivered that eulogy for no other purpose than to vindicate himself; that by publicly proclaiming his high regard for the dead professor he hoped to convince people that there was no foundation for the report that he had hounded Syle to his grave.

The Testimony

Instead of vindicating himself, however, President Wheeler, proved himself, say the friends of Syle, to be a rank hypocrite. They say that he not only prosecuted Syle but that he added hypocrisy and falsehood to that offense. Surely these are serious charges to be made against the President of the State University, and if Dr. Wheeler does not institute legal proceedings against his detractors, the regents of the university should demand that he do something to vindicate himself. If the friends of Professor Syle are telling the truth Dr. Wheeler is not a fit man to have charge of the training of the youth of this State. The evidence against Dr. Wheeler is founded on the testimony of two prominent citizens of Oakland. One of them, Dr. E. M. Patterson, a reputable physician, says that Wheeler prevented Syle from obtaining employment in the public schools of California by announcing that he would oppose the granting of a State certificate. Dr. Patterson pleaded with Wheeler to withdraw his opposition but the university president refused, saying that Syle was "a pessimist and a man of low ideals whose influence was pernicious." Incidentally Wheeler suggested, says Dr. Patterson, that Syle be advised to leave the State. Yet President Wheeler pronounced an extravagant eulogy on Syle a few weeks ago. If that public eulogy was a truthful portrayal of the character of Syle, then Wheeler should be eager to establish his innocence of the charge of having persecuted the unfortunate man. I have always regarded Wheeler as a very shifty individual, but I never thought him capable of such duplicity as that of which he now stands accused.

The Gonzalez Case

By the death of Dr. M. E. Gonzalez the other day, recollections were revived of one of the most bitterly contested divorce suits in the records of our Superior Court. There figured as one of the principals in that suit a woman who is now conspicuous in the American colony in Paris, and who occasionally occupies a sumptuous home in Santa Cruz. I refer to Mrs. J. Philip Smith whose husband is a millionaire, and a member of the famous firm of Crosse & Blackwell. Mrs. Smith was formerly Susie Crooks, daughter of Matthew Crooks, an old resident of this city who died many years ago leaving a large fortune. When she was quite young she married Dr. Gonzalez who was then a young man, a member of an old Spanish-Mexican family living in Monterey county. He was very rich, for his father, unlike many of the old Spanish settlers, was thrifty, and when the Gringoes came they despoiled him of none of his possession. Susie Crooks was a beautiful girl, vivacious and sufficiently unconventional to be considered piquant and dashing. The marriage was a love-match, but Dr. Gonzalez was extremely jealous of his handsome wife, and he seemed eager to give rein to suspicions.

The Conspiracy

Under the circumstances the divorce suit instituted by him was a logical sequel. Dr. Gonzalez believed that he had been wronged, and he succeeded in casting odium on the reputation of his wife, but in later years there came developments that, I believe, had a tendency to convince him that a grievous injustice had been done a woman. At the time of his domestic trouble Dr. Gonzalez was associated with some young men who were engaged in coaching him in his medical studies. He was very generous to them and they took advantage of his liberality. In those days the young Spaniard had quite an elastic leg and his friends had a tight grip on it. They undertook to supply the evidence against his wife, and I have heard that she was the victim of a base conspiracy the purpose of which was to "bleed" her husband. One of the witnesses against her remarked, some years ago, that he would regret to the end of his days that part that he played in the conspiracy against Mrs. Gonzalez. Several years after the granting of the divorce Dr. Gonzalez discovered the perfidy of his friends, It was not, however, until they sought to have him indicted. They went before the Grand Jury and told a sensational story about a conspiracy which he had instigated for the poisoning of one of their number. It was such an impossible story that Gonzalez was given a hearing, and when he was told of what his erstwhile friends had been trying to do he was amazed. He declared that it was evident that a conspiracy was in process of development, and that he was the intended victim. The case created a great sensation at the time on account of the prominence of the principals. One of the men involved was a Dr. Johnson. No indictments were filed. A few years after the separation Mrs. Gonzalez became the wife of J. Philip Smith. The daughter of her first marriage, now out of her teens, is residing with her mother in Paris.

When Bohemia and Society Mingled

The usual fashionable mob attended the members' reception that opened the Bohemian Club's seventh annual art exhibition on Tuesday night. There was quite a large sprinkling of Society there, with the familiar faces of artists and dilettanti. There were some handsome gowns worn, but nothing especially striking. Bernie Drown was in gray; Pearl Landers in brown with a pale blue feather boa; Mrs. Fremont Older in gray; Mrs. Helen Tay, in white; Mrs. Carroll Cook, in white; Mrs. Buckingham, in black; Miss Brastow, in gray. Gray, by the way, appears to be a favorite shade this season. When the guests adjourned to the supper room the scene became quite animated. Mr. Phelan had a large party at one table, the Frank Deerings and some friends made up another group, James McNab had another party, and Colonel Trumbo another. The exhibition this year is, as a whole, superior to any that went before it. The method used by the hanging committee was not, however, in every instance a success. I do not think the large canvases, particularly those of Peters, show to such good advantage hung high as they are. The glassing, too, does not improve many of the paintings. It gives them a flat look.

Some In the Hanging

Robert Aitken's sketches and portraits in sculpture and Putnam's lions and tigers are an interesting feature of the exhibition. Charlie Dickman was there Tuesday night and the critics had good opportunity to compare the original with his portrait in Aitken's panel, which is a most artistic thing. Peck's portrait of Charles Wheeler is best seen at long range; its full effect is lost when lorgnetted too closely. Peck also shows portraits of Mrs. Hearst and Mrs. Hooe, of Washington, D. C. Clawson has some charming portraits of children—the Breuner boy and girl, and Constance Hart. Cadenasso has a study he calls "A Native Daughter," which is a portrait very uniquely treated. Cadenasso's "Mystic Pool" and "The Marsh" are in his best manner. Bloomer has some beautiful things, and Stanton's "Toilers of the Sea," a work full of human interest, is decorated with a "Sold" sign. Robinson's "Surf in the Moonlight" is inspiration for poets. Mathews has some cypress studies somewhat out of his usual vein, and worthy of attention. Breuer, Carlson, Earl Cummings, Willis Davis, Dickinson, Dickman, Dixon, Fonda, Gamble, Jorgensen, Judson, Latimer, Martinez, McComas, Peters, Seawell, Straus and Welch are others exhibiting. A small canvas by Gamble, a poppy field, is one of the best things on the walls. Indeed it is among the small canvases that one often finds the greater amount of artistry.

He Quotes Fervid Poetry for Them

Count Gremani, the new social lion, is surely cutting a wide swath among those of our elect whose affectation of culture is becoming quite amusing. Count Gremani is said to be a perfect type of the aristocratic Italian. He is of the artistic temperament, draws and paints cleverly and with some manifestation of talent, and he is a musical enthusiast, who knows all there is worth knowing about the modern school of Italian music. He is also up in literature, has Dante at his tongue-tip, and goes into raptures over D'Annunzio. Our society girls like to talk to him about the Italian poets, and they are good listeners when he quotes fervid passages from their works in his impassioned Latin style.

Mrs. Salisbury Critically Ill

The friends and relatives of Mrs. Monroe Salisbury have been very much alarmed over her condition during the past week. She had a fainting spell a week ago, and since then she has been dangerously ill from heart failure. Mrs. Salisbury has not been in good health for months. Since the wedding of her daughter, Mrs. Boardman, a year ago, she has had a number of severe attacks. She grieved so intensely over the loss of her daughter that she had to go to a sanitarium last summer.

The Keramic Club's Exhibition

It is universally agreed that this season's exhibition of the work of the Keramic club was the best in its history. The display of Mrs. S. V. Culp, President of the club, was of special excellence, much of it being in beautiful cool greens. Her Eucalyptus vase was particularly striking. Mrs. Alice Haynes's work was up to her usual standard. Her flower decorations are always admired. Miss Emily Hesselmeyer had a Stork vase and an Iris vase, both excellent, as were also the American Beauty and Peacock vases of Mrs. Jakobs. Mrs. M. E. Perley's table was a centre of attraction. I was not surprised to see her Moorish lamp marked "Sold." Her gold and enamel work is strikingly rich. Much of her decoration was in oriental and conventional patterns. Much interest was also shown in Mrs. Taylor's display, which indeed merited all the attention it received. Her large vase in black and gold was one of the finest pieces in the room, and a gipsy kettle in a conventional pattern of blue and gold struck quite a new note. It would be impossible to catalogue all the good things in the exhibit, but I may mention Mrs. Root's Odette tea set. Mrs. Scudder's Morning Glory vase, and Miss Thompson's portraits in monochrome as being particularly excellent. The Misses Kleinschmidt had some skillful reproductions of Rembrandt, Van Dyck, Raphael, and other masters, very fine and conscientious work. Artistically the exhibit was a success, and perhaps financially too, as I noticed many buyers.

The Pansy Blossoms' Bazaar

There were several functions on last Saturday, but the vaudeville and bazaar given by the Heartsease Auxiliary in Maple hall did not suffer for lack of attendance. An immense audience jammed into the hall in the evening. There was a preliminary program of miscellaneous numbers before the production of Jerome's one-act play "Sunset." Miss Aileen Castella gave a pretty song and dance, Miss Callahan played the banjo, Mr. Adelstein gave some lute solos, Cecil Cowles played a Chopin valse and one of her own compositions, Miss Plagemann sang and "Sunset" was presented with a cast including Misses Cooke, Coxe and Schroth, Messrs. Thompson, Hopper and McKinnie. Some of the dialogue dragged but one expects that with amateurs, and as a whole it was a very creditable production. Pretty society girls acted as ushers, and the audience appeared pleased with everything offered for its entertainment.

The Bustless Athletic Feminine

The Sunday supps are going in largely just now for athletics for women. A careful study of the illustrations given to show the various poses women should assume to gain curves will reveal that by developing her muscles the athletic woman sacrifices one of the most charming features of her anatomy. It is well known that a woman with an abnormal chest usually lacks development below it. If the athletic cult should spread the poets of passion would be deprived of the source of their most rapturous inspiration. The bustless woman can never pose as an artist's model.

School Politics

Elisha Brooks, principal of the Girls' High School, is getting ready to resign, and numerous pedagogues are casting anxious eyes on the job, which is worth two hundred and fifty dollars a month with nothing to do. Mrs. Mary Prag, head of the history department, is said to be the most forceful member of the faculty, and she is mentioned for promotion, but School Director Cecil Mark has his eye on the place. He regards it as a sinecure to which, he thinks, he should be assigned when he retires from the board, at the expiration of his term a year hence. Brooks' assertion that he will not retire for another year may or may not indicate that he wishes his retirement to synchronize with Mark's effacement from the service of the city in his present capacity. Mark is an accomplished political acrobat and wire-puller. He hopes to be chosen president of the board during the last year of his term, but while the precedent has been established in most of the municipal commissions of electing the short-term member presiding officer, the School Directors have not adhered to the rule. They broke away from precedent last year when Larry Walsh was appointed for only one year and Ruef's friend Woodward was made President. Roncovieri has his eye on the presidency too, and therefore Mark's chances are not very bright. Woodward hopes to go on the supplies committee and he may be gratified though he is no longer as close to Schmitz as he was. Walsh is now the candidate of the Mayor, and the shifty Mark is a rank outsider.

He Found the Maps

Anent the venerable Elisha Brooks, I am reminded of the story of a visit made to his school by Directors Roncovieri and Walsh about a year ago. With commendable curiosity and zeal Roncovieri expressed a desire to learn what had become of the supplies. He made a pretty thorough search and while prowling around in the cellar, stumbled over a bundle of new maps. His volatile Latin blood boiled and he literally flew to the calm presence of the imperturbable Brooks, whom he assailed in language hardly printable and with gestures quite indescribable. Brooks listened unmoved, and replied to Roncovieri's outburst with the terse assurance that he "really had no idea how the maps got there," and then refused to discuss the matter. The maps were removed to the storehouse of the supply department. "That man wouldn't say a word," said an official of the department, "if you tore the building down."

An Appreciated Teacher

A few weeks ago I took occasion to refer to the persecution of Mrs. I. D. Reeves, by the politicians of the school department, and I stated that she was one of the most successful educators in this city, and one whose salutary influence was still felt by many of her old pupils of the Girls' High School now grown to womanhood. Since her reinstatement to the Polytechnic High School she has proved that her influence over boys is as wholesome and marked as it was among the girls. Upon her recent dismissal the boys of her class sent her this letter which bespeaks their appreciation of her ability:

Mrs. I. D. Reeves,

Kind friend and teacher: We, the members of your classes and of the Polytechnic High School, tender you this expression of the gratitude and love we bear you. Accept our feeble recognition of your efforts and sacrifices in our behalf in your capacity as teacher. We feel that we are indebted to you and we are therefore compelled to acknowledge our appreciation of your untiring kindness, and of your valuable and encouraging aid in our scholastic labors. You have so harmoniously blended the functions of the teacher with those of the friend, that you have made study a pleasure. You have always shown yourself the friend of the industrious and deserving pupil; ever ready to encourage by your kind words, thus giving new hope and dispelling all gloomy forebodings, pointing an easy and effective way to overcome all difficulties and remove all obstacles. We will ever try to be mindful of the many valuable precepts that you have often expounded to us as rules of conduct, and we will in all our undertakings endeavor to act on the impulse that will prove the sincerity of our principles. We trust that you will soon return to your post among the teachers and pupils to whom you have made yourself so congenial and helpful.

Bob (dressing for the ball): "Hang it! There goes a buttonhole. Lend me a collar, old man."

Rob: "Sure. Which kind, polished or divorced?"

Bob: "Divorced?"

Rob: "Yes. Domestic finish, you know."

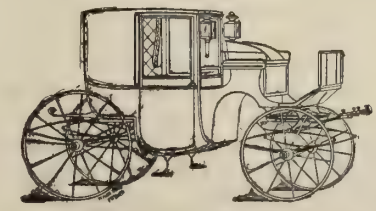
A Windfall for Rix

Under the will of Julian Rix, the artist, his brother Edward becomes the owner of a collection of valuable paintings which he will have no trouble in selling and which will net him a handsome sum. The works of Julian Rix are appraised highly by Eastern connoisseurs. Ed Rix, by the way, will appreciate the legacy, for he has not been prosperous of late. A hoodoo pursued him after his divorce from Mamie Kittredge. They were a happy couple until a Christian Science experience upset their dreams of bliss. When they were divorced he surrendered half his property to his wife and then he married Alice Ballard MacDonald, who achieved such fame in journalism that he became known as "Alice Rix's husband." Their marriage proved a failure too, and after their divorce Rix married his first wife and the second Mrs. Rix became Mrs. O'Leary. I hear that the Rix's have been separated again, but Mrs. O'Leary is enjoying wedded bliss in Paris.

Wants to be a Nun

Miss Anita Harvey is said to have lived so much in the atmosphere of convents that she wishes to become a nun. The idea of "coming out" next year, the fate her mother, Mrs. Downey Harvey, has in store for her, is said to be exceedingly abhorrent to this young girl. Yet she is by no means of the conventual type in looks and pursuits. She is athletic and a daring horsewoman. The Harvey sisters are finishing their studies in Europe but will return to San Francisco next year.

Others Who Had the Desire



This desire for a convent existence has not been confined to Downey Harvey's young daughter. Several of our society girls nourished the desire to give up the world for religion, before they knew what the world was like. Birdie Fair was one, but she soon reconciled herself to the life of a society girl. Agnes Tobin has often expressed her determination to become a religieuse, and Julia de Laveaga, now a happy bride, was for several years thinking of taking the veil.

Named for Birdie

Little "Chiffon" Kemp, who was thrust into the limelight as the child Mrs. Arthur Kemp deserted for Hollis Hunnewell, has Mrs. Willie K. Vanderbilt Jr. for a godmother. One of Chiffon's baptismal names is Virginia. Mrs. Kemp-Hunnewell, by the way, had to abjure the faith of her fathers to re-marry. But then ancestral beliefs cut no figure these days, when Eros comes on the scene.

The Goddess of Love

Though Joan Hadenfeldt will be billed at the Orpheum, where she makes her debut tomorrow, as "Joan Haden," the disguise will be but the thinnest gauze to those familiar with this striking beauty's features. And nearly everyone knows her by sight, if not more intimately, for she has been pictured in Sunday supps galore and has had her portrait exhibited for the public to gaze at. It was Clawson's portrait of Miss Hadenfeldt in a black velvet gown against a rich red background that started other artists to seeking similar effects in the painting of women. "Miss Haden's" stunt will be illustrations of the four seasons of love and it should be a success if realism counts for anything, for Joan Hadenfeldt has had more adorations than the average girl. She is usually picked out in a crowd by the swarm of men surrounding her. She is nearly six feet tall and of fine proportions. Clawson is not the only one who has painted her portrait, for she never refused to sit for an artist. Amedee Joullin, who was at one time rather epris in her direction, was among those who perpetuated her on canvas.

Irish Holds On

The announcement by one of the dailies that Colonel John P. Irish was about to lose the position of Naval Officer was premature. Republican politicians have been on the trail of Colonel Irish for several years but they have never succeeded in worrying him. However, when it was learned some days ago that ex-Congressman Wood of Stockton had decided to get out of the fight for Naval Officer, and that Senator Ralston would be substituted, it seemed reasonably certain that Irish's tenure of office was at an end. But Senator Ralston and his friends had not reckoned with the eccentric Senator Bard. Nobody ever knows what Bard is going to do. He doesn't always know, himself, and as a rule nobody in Washington cares. In addition to being an unknown quantity he is such an unimportant one that he ranks in the cipher class. But there are certain courtesies which Senators are guaranteed, and that is why Bard cut some figure in the chase for Irish's job. Ralston was recommended by Perkins, but old Bill Cutter of Yuba, the most wild-eyed job-chaser in the State, coveted the position, and secured the endorsement of Bard. The Senators were expected to unite in their recommendation, and not having done so Colonel Irish will continue to serve his country at a munificent salary.

Cutter's Record

When the news reached San Francisco that Senator Bard had recommended the appointment of Cutter, the politicians threw up their hands. Last week he refused to join in Perkins's recommendation of Fisk for postmaster, because, as he said, he "did not know the Speaker of the Assembly." The politicians are wondering whether he really knows Cutter. They are sure that he only imagines that he does. Bard is a puritan in politics, and he is also a reformer. He is popularly supposed to have a contempt for the ways of the professional practical politician, and yet he has recommended Cutter of Yuba, a man with a shrieking record, for Naval Officer of San Francisco. Cutter was formerly a Democratic member of the legislature of Nevada. When he settled in Yuba he became a Republican. He served two terms in the Assembly and one in the Senate, and after being a State Senator he had no hesitation in going back to Sacramento to become an assistant Sergeant-at-Arms at six dollars a day. He drew the money very promptly but about the only time he was seen around the capitol was when he worked as stenographer in an election contest, for which service he collected fifteen dollars, unmindful of the fact that he was a salaried officer of the State.

A Suggestion to Bard

Cutter is a man of some influence as a machine politician in Yuba, and last year he succeeded in sending a delegation to the State convention to nominate himself for the Senate. Incidentally, it should be stated that he prevented the veteran Judge Davis from going to the convention, though for many years he was employed by Davis as a stenographer. Later on he secured the chairmanship of the State Central Committee by voting two proxies for himself. He was elected by one vote. During the campaign he took advantage of his position as chairman of the State Central Committee to keep the political pot boiling in Yuba county. The best speakers were sent to Cutter's county but Cutter was defeated. He was beaten by a Democrat in a Republican county. I have heard it suggested that before making any more recommendations Bard should spend a few weeks traveling through California getting acquainted with the people. At the same time he might familiarize himself with the career of Cutter in the legislature.

The New Tivoli

If organized labor can be prevailed upon to refrain from causing any more delays in the work of reconstructing the building to be occupied as the new Tivoli, that theatre will be opened to the public during the week of the twenty-first. From a peep that I have had at the interior I am convinced that the new Tivoli will be the most sumptuous, and best appointed theatre in the city. And by the way the traditions of the old house are not to guide at the new. For instance, smoking will be prohibited on the

She Couldn't Choose

There is a pretty story attached to the six costly diamond rings worn by the young bride of William Lynham Shiels. Mr. Shiels met his wife, then Miss Elsie Bennett of Oakland, last spring, when they were members of a house-party at the magnificent country seat of Tom Williams, whose wife is a cousin of Mrs. Shiels. The engagement was announced in September when Mrs. C. A. Bennett and her daughter, Miss Elsie Beatrice Bennett, returned to Oakland. Soon after their home-coming Mr. Shiels came back to San Francisco and it was shortly after his return that he exhibited to his fiancee six rings—each one worth a small fortune—that she might select from among them an engagement jewel. Slipping the glittering hoops on her fingers, Miss Elsie looked long and lovingly at them, then, with an adorable smile at her betrothed, she said sweetly: "I don't know which of them to give up—they are all so perfectly lovely." "Keep them all; that's the easiest way to settle that," enthusiastically cried Mr. Shiels.

A Row in the Ebell Society

The liveliest row—if such a coarse expression may be used in connection with the grande dames of across-the-bay society—that ever took place in the upper circles of Oakland's swagger set is now in full swing among the members of the "Most Exclusive Women" of the Ebell Society. And all over a moving! The old club house has been found too small to accommodate its members and it is proposed to buy a site and build a house that will be as handsome as its inmates. It was supposed that a desirable place had been found in a fashionable up-town corner on Telegraph avenue. So far every one was agreeable. But the Ebell ladies have a lease of their present house which will not expire for four years. And that is where the trouble begins. Rather than have that lease, like the proverbial sword of Damocles, hanging over their heads, the timid ones will fight, and that is just what they are doing. At the last two meetings of this august club feeling has run so high that—well, the members are not telling all that happened, but they do say that it was the worst rumpus that ever a number of well-bred society women took part in. The president of the club, Miss Mabel Thayer Gray, is said to be using her influence toward the preservation of harmony. Personally, she is believed to be in favor of acquiring the Telegraph avenue site.

Shakespeare at the Adelphian

Mrs. James F. McGauley, president of the Mills Club, Mrs. George Law Smith and Miss Maude Smith, Mrs. Sexton, and many other clubwomen went over to Alameda last Saturday, when the Adelphian Club's Shakespeare section produced an original playlet by Mrs. Will Maddern. The Shakespeare section was originated about a year ago by Mrs. George Perry, who is its curator. The little play contains eight characters, drawn from Shakespeare's women, who give their ideas on various subjects of interest to clubwomen. All of the parts were well sustained. It was considered the best amateur performance ever given in Alameda.

Intends to be Cautious

One of our haughtiest matrons became quite confidential at the Greenway ball, while talking to a circle of friends about charity. "Do you know," she said, "I think I shall devote all my energies to the blind this winter, for you know they can't recognize you in the street, and embarrass you by making people think they are your friends."

The Penalty of Popularity

Christine Pomeroy has made such a hit at the dances that I fear she is exciting a great deal of envy, and that is a dangerous thing for a girl to do. She keeps no account of her partners for the waltzes and the two-step, with the result that there are four or five claimants for every dance. Usually the huskiest chap wins, for Miss Pomeroy is partial to brawn. She is not pretty but she has a frank, ingenuous manner that attracts.

His Remarkable Nerve

It was with no surprise that I read of the coolness of Lieutenant-Commander H. M. Witzel—not Wiltsea, or Wiltse, as the press dispatches have it—of the navy during the exciting period of the outbreak at Colon. He was ever a cool, determined officer, and by a strange coincidence Colon was the scene of a closely similar incident nearly nineteen years ago, when Witzel was a young ensign, in the landing force with Commander, now Rear-Admiral, Bowman H. McCalla, during the revolution of 1884-85. Walking alongside of McCalla, Witzel, who commanded a section of howitzers, came suddenly face to face with a barricade, over which peered a row of ugly faces, and the muzzles of a lot of threatening rifles.

"Shall I go into battery, sir?" asked Witzel of McCalla, as he halted his men.

"Not yet," replied the imperturbable commander, and then McCalla calmly walked straight to the barricade, and knocked up the muzzles of the leveled rifles with his sword to the utter astonishment of the natives who immediately fled. The barricade was destroyed and the American column moved on. Witzel always said that was the greatest exhibition of coolness he had ever witnessed.

The Man For the Crisis

One of the most interesting characters in the Panama secession, a naval man informs me, is General Huertas, who has been made the commander-in-chief of the Panama army. Huertas was a strong and courageous fighter for the Colombian Conservative government during the last revolution, which ended last year, and he made many good battles against the very Liberals of Panama with whom he is now staunchly allied. He was a Colonel of the famous Battalion of Colombia during that long struggle, the organization, in reality a large regiment rather than a battalion, which is the only body of troops in the whole land with discipline and equipment approaching anywhere near civilized standards. In addition, he had the command of a little two-gun gunboat, called the Chucuito, which, until the American-manned cruiser Bogota arrived on the scene, was the only naval vessel worthy of any consideration that the Conservatives had on the Pacific Coast. With this tiny vessel, Huertas more than once dared go beyond the safe retreat of Panama, and even at one time exchanged shots with the much more powerful and larger Padilla. In one action, Huertas had the lower half of his right arm shot away, but did not let that dissuade him from keeping up the fight. After the Bogota arrived, the Americans upon her were quick to recognize and appreciate Huertas' admirable qualities, and a strong friendship grew up between them. He is small of stature, modest, cool, intelligent, and courteous. He has none of the bombast, arrogance and excitability of the Colombians, and it was no doubt his intelligence combined with genuine patriotism that induced him to espouse the side of Panama with his crack battalion. Without Huertas and his soldiers the secession and the independence of Panama would probably not have occurred. Huertas supplied the force which enabled the Junta to take the step, furnished the means of allaying disorder and avoided bloodshed. With Huertas in charge of the military, and an educated, broad-minded, progressive man like Morales as Minister of Foreign Affairs, the new republic has shown excellent judgment in the choice of officials for responsible positions.

A New Word Wanted

It is fully six weeks since the coup d'etat on the isthmus, yet the authorities have not yet supplied us with a satisfactory adjective to correspond with Panama. Our vocabulary suffers sorely for lack of it. We have had Panaman, Panamanian, Panamese, Panamaneno, and two or three others, none of which is entirely unobjectionable. Panaman seems the most logical, but when applied to a denizen of the new state it is a safe bet that linguistic rowdies will pluralize it into Panamen, just as they have called the Mussulmans Musselmen. I would suggest Panamananas. What is the matter with that? The happy combination of the Anglicized Greek "pan" with the national characteristic "manana" is something to give joy to the crustiest philologist.

McCalla Appreciated

I notice that the efficiency of Rear-Admiral Bowman H. McCalla is appreciated by foreigners even more than by his own countrymen, particularly his excellent services in the international expedition for the relief of the legations in Pekin a few years ago. A bill has been introduced in Congress authorizing him to accept the decoration of the Order of the Second Class of the Red Eagle, tendered by Emperor William of Germany, together with swords presented by the same sovereign, in recognition of his exploits in China. I have no doubt that the bill will pass, as it should, for such recognition has a salutary effect. Every officer is of course expected to do his duty, regardless of special reward, but when he does it exceptionally well special reward is appropriate.

startled when I learned a few days ago of the seizure by Special Treasury Agent Caleb W. West of three barrels, containing fourteen thousand Mexican cigars, alleged to have been smuggled in on the cruiser New York. This is wholesale work with a vengeance, and the chief mystery of it is the manner in which the heavy load was spirited ashore. It was something of a coincidence that on the same day United States Judge De Haven sentenced a man to four months imprisonment for smuggling a small quantity of opium on the merchant steamer City of Puebla. The outcome of the New York affair is to be awaited with interest. It was plainly a case wherein not only the letter but the spirit of the law was violated by a government ship.

Old Sea Dogs

Apropos the longevity of naval officers, which has been often commented upon, I note that England has recently commemorated the eighty-ninth birthday of Admiral Sir E. Ommanney, R. N., the sole survivor of the famous naval battle of Navarino, fought seventy-six years ago. Admiral Ommanney was then a midshipman upon the line-of-battle ship Albion, '74, commanded by his uncle, Captain J. A. Ommanney. There have been instances of even greater longevity in our own Navy; for example, Commodore Hull, who died but a short time ago at one hundred years of age, while Rear-Admiral Thomas O. Selfridge, Sr., passed well beyond his ninetieth year, and the interesting spectacle was presented of a father and son, both of the same name, on the list of retired Rear-Admirals at the same time. The son, Thomas O. Selfridge, Jr., has recently been assigned to active duty again as president of a board of inspection, owing to the dearth of officers on the active list. It is not so very long ago that I had the pleasure of dining and talking with the late Rear-Admiral Hiram Paulding, U. S. Navy, a survivor of the war of 1812, in which he was a midshipman.

Mrs. Madden's Plight

The case of Mrs. Madden, it is said, has put a stop to flirtations in the army, for the officers are now afraid of being court-martialed. As a consequence, the wives of army officers whose husbands are in the Philippines are now sailing for the Orient. Mrs. Madden's plight is a sad one, and reflects great discredit on the army. The sentiment of the army is that she has been treated outrageously. Her brother-in-law, Baron Von Horst, is the only one of her relatives from whom she gets any sympathy. The Partellos are almost as severe in their disapproval as are the Maddens.

The "Easy" Public

Jimmy Davis, the book-maker who was ruled off the turf the other day for corrupting jockeys and defrauding the public, is said to be one of that class of gamblers who never gamble; that is, they never hazard their money. They bet only on those events that have been ordained to happen in harmony with their interests. And that reminds me that Davis had a large bet on the recent Gardner-Fitzsimmons fight, which, it is to be presumed, was no more free from the fake element than the average prize-ring contest. It was significant that Davis had bet about four thousand dollars on Gardner. The presumption should be that the thrifty Fitzsimmons had agreed to go out, but having failed to do so, the inference now is that the familiar coup d'etat known in prize-ring parlance as the "double-cross" was engineered, and perhaps it was especially arranged for the discomfiture of the enterprising Danny Lynch, who is associated with Davis. If such was the case it was a pretty revenge that Fitzsimmons enjoyed at the expense of the man who arranged the Wyatt Earp deal some years ago. The whole tenderloin was on a broad smile the day after the Gardner-Fitzsimmons affair, but the unsophisticated dailies refrained from discussing the matter. The complaisance that characterizes the attitude of the dailies toward the plug-uglies who are engaged in enriching the gamblers at the expense of the public is amazing. I have been advised that nine out of every ten prize-fights that take place in this city are in the nature of a farce.

One of the Crew

The exposure of the crooked ring that had been operating on the Oakland track was complete, and it will have a salutary effect on the racing game, but I have heard it hinted that Davis did not divulge the names of all the people who were interested in his book. Moreover I have heard that among the crew employed by Davis was a civil service clerk connected with the Registrar's office in this city, and that he had been granted a leave of absence so that he could work at the track. That should be a matter of some interest to Mayor Schmitz.

The Temptation

The officials of the Oakland track are deserving of high praise for the promptness with which they ruled the guilty parties off the turf. The fate of the crooked jockeys will serve as a warning to others, and the probability is that the sport will be conducted on a higher plane during the remainder of the season. It is unfortunate that more drastic punishment could not be visited upon the men who engage in the nefarious business of corrupting small boys and jeopardizing their means of livelihood. Usually the unfortunate jockeys who are caught in the meshes of the thieving gamblers are minors whose earnings are turned over to their parents or guardians. The money with which they are bribed, they keep, and such is the character of their associations and their habits, it is not difficult to tempt them. Some of them are too young to appreciate the risk they run, and a few hundred dollars is a glitteringly tempting pile to a lad who is vouchsafed only a small fraction of his honest earnings, and especially to one whose moral training has been neglected.

Must Show Him

A few weeks ago Dick Peters, of New York, started in hot pursuit of Cornelia Baxter Tevis. Object, matrimony, it was said, and it looks that way, for while Dick is keeping close to Cornelia in Europe, and seeing that no foreign noblemen are casting covetous glances her way, his friends are sending inquiries to this city regarding the size of the lady's fortune. They are anxious to know just how much she inherited from the Tevis estate. They have been told that she didn't receive more than a million, and it is thought that when Dick learns the truth he will back up. His friends say that a million isn't enough to tempt Dick Peters, but in the present state of the New York stock market, it's no bagatelle. The supposition is that Dick Peters thinks that it is worth a great deal more than a million to link himself to a Western widow to assist her in climbing into New York society. Peters, by the way, has been vaguely described in the despatches as "A New York society man." The corruption of his Christian name gives the impression that he hasn't reached the age and dignity of "Richard," but he has been "doing" society for over a quarter of a century. He is in the fifties.

Homes for the Students

With the object of providing more comfortable living accommodations for the student body of the University of California, a committee of faculty members and alumni has just been formed. As there are no dormitories at the university, the students are obliged to live in club-houses, boarding houses and fraternity houses conducted on a co-operative basis. A club-house loan fund is being raised by subscription, for the purpose of enabling groups of students who may organize a boarding house club to obtain money for the purchase of furniture and other necessaries for housekeeping. When this equipment has been provided, the student bodies will have no difficulty in maintaining themselves. Moreover, they will have pleasant and comfortable homes, congenial companionship and proper surroundings, and all at small individual expense. Student clubs which obtain their club-house equipment through the medium of this fund will repay the loan in ten installments. The committee taking the initial step in this movement for the betterment and comfort of the students are: Dr. Mary Bennett Ritter, chairman; Professor George C. Edwards, secretary; Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Mrs. Leon J. Richardson, Mrs. Warren Cheney, Dr. Jessica Peixotto, Professor J. T. Allen, Professor William Carey Jones, and Warren Olney Jr.

A Clerical Contrast

When the Rev. Robert Coyle, the former pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Oakland, was re-visiting his old parish last summer, a close friendship sprang up between him and the present pastor, the Rev. Ernest E. Baker. Now it is a well known fact that Dr. Coyle's economical use of his salary enabled him to invest profitably in Oakland real estate, and that nothing of the lighter joys of life have ever found a place in his scheme of existence. Jolly Dr. Baker, on the contrary, is avowedly a bon vivant. He is a noted golfer and is always to be found on the links whenever the club gathers at the point for a day of sport and good fellowship. He argues that nothing is too good for the members of his cloth. Sitting in Dr. Baker's luxurious library in the perfectly appointed Thirteenth street residence, one evening, Dr. Coyle said gravely to his host: "I never smoke twenty-five cent cigars; I do not play golf or other games; I do not pay extravagant rent; I neither eat nor give expensive dinners; and when I go from home I do not put up at the most fashionable hotels—but, I own valuable real estate and——"

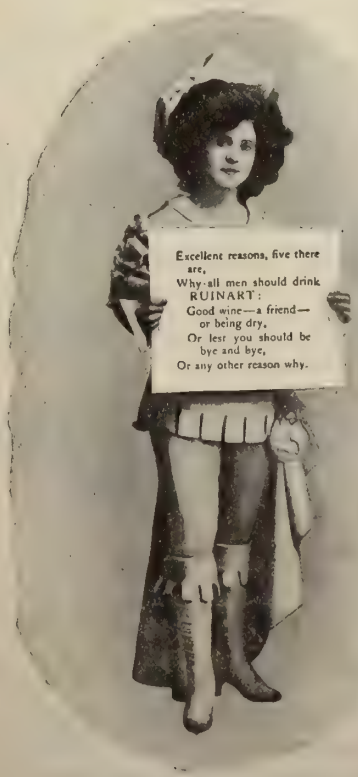
"Humph!" retorted Dr. Baker, the characteristic twinkle in his eyes, "I do smoke twenty-five cent cigars—when I can't get better; I do play golf, and I am good at it, too; I give the best dinners that the market affords and that my cook is able to prepare; I accept invitations to dinner-parties, wear a dress suit and enjoy myself; when I go from home I travel in the best style there is and put up at the best hotels——"

"I own real estate——" interrupted Dr. Coyle.

"And good property it is, but you have no advantage over me," cried Dr. Baker, with a chuckle. "I live in it and—we are both satisfied."



Fatal Impetuosity

The death of Herbert Spencer afforded those two distinguished academicians, Dr. David Starr Jordan and Dr. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, an opportunity to respond to an invitation to rush into print. It's a foolhardy thing for a university president to do. When it comes to expressing his thoughts on paper for general circulation he should take his time. I am sure that when Jordan and Wheeler read their ponderous platitudes in print in one of the evening journals they fairly gasped. Moreover, I am certain that after reading, each wondered what he meant. Some of their language defied interpretation. Their utterances were pedantic and neither had anything to say worth hearing. Their views were painfully academic. In the opinion of both, Spencer was one of the greatest thinkers of his time. The fact is he was a dealer with the thoughts of others and with current notions. He never delved into the unknown. His admirers tell us that he was a pioneer in philosophy, a co-discoverer of the Darwinian theory, but those familiar with Coleridge's essays on Shakespeare know that he was able to define all that is vital in the Darwinian theory fifty years before Darwin was heard of. Spencer was not a genius. He was merely a man of equable temperament, of impartial view and tireless industry, and it was as an exponent of common sense that he attracted attention.

His Jejune Essays

As a thinker he was not to be classed with Shakespeare, or Bacon, or even with Emerson. In his last book, "Facts and Comments," he presented a series of essays on such subjects as "Patriotism," "Party Government," "The Pursuit of Prettiness" and "Imperialism and Slavery." They abounded in platitudes and would have supplied interesting reading for those magazines that supply quick culture for the illiterate. They might have been signed by some hopeless mediocrity, and then they would not have attracted any attention. Yet they were filled with common sense. In his essay on patriotism he says "the cry of our country, right or wrong, seems detestable." He loves the England that freed slaves but dislikes the England that would add to its possessions. Quite a commonplace view, and not half so interesting as some that Tolstoy has expressed on the same subject. He discussed style and quoted with approval the French saying, "The style is the man," and then he tried to improve it by varying it, thus: "Style is organic." Surely Mr. Spencer's admirers won't contend that he improved the Gallic epigram. He didn't even convey the Frenchman's meaning, for the latter meant that style was essentially personal. Spencer turned the concrete into the abstract and slaughtered the phrase. It's dangerous to trifle with the subtleties of French literature. Mr. Spencer assumed to be a literary critic, and he made the dogmatic assertion that "Avoidance of defects of construction is a primary requisite of style." Rather an awkward phrase for a stylist to use, and incidentally inaccurate. A genius converts defects into perfections, and thereby creates style. Many writers are so cautious in avoiding defects that they become stilted and vague—Jordan and Wheeler, for example. It was an evil genius that prompted Herbert Spencer to write about style. I think it is his own execrable style that prejudices me against him.

An Election Satire

The Ben Hur burlesque written by Will Irwin of the Chronicle, for the Bohemian Club jinks, is bright enough for presentation on the professional stage. It is the sort of thing that the management of Fischer's should be eager for, and it is reminiscent of the burlesque skits that made the Standard theatre popular in the days of Reed and Emerson, when local happenings were satirized in burlesques on popular plays. Irwin's skit is a satire on the late election. The three wise men are Schmitz, Crocker and Lane. The hero is Abe Hur. For the galley scene there has been substituted a chain-gang scene on a public road where the convicts are working, each man secured by chain and ball. Abe Hur sells his chain and the purchaser files it off. Abe hurls a rock from a roof during a Labor Parade and kills Crocker, who is making an open-air address. He is arrested and exclaims, "I never done it." The piece abounds in gags with a local flavor.

Expects Great Things of Himself

I hear that Mr. "Watson," the monologuist who "came out" at Mrs. McLaren's week before last, has made good. His next engagement is at Mrs. McCutcheon's and after that he is to recite for Mrs. Salisbury, who will give him the brand of the elect. He hails, I believe, from San Rafael, and Watson is not his real name. He is merely using this name temporarily, as he feels that his present work is only pot-boiling. He hopes to become a literary celebrity and he feels that if ever he does something worth while he will not wish to be reminded that he once made his living as a parlor entertainer. When a man is so cautious in anticipation of fame, he betrays a constitutional disability that may prove disastrous to his hopes. However, Mr. Watson may be an exception and really succeed in doing something worth while.

When She Hears the News

Many of Mrs. Will Crocker's acquaintances are eager to know what sort of message Willie will receive when his wife learns that he threw open the doors of her home to the polloi, by way of charity. Though there was nothing in the house that could be stolen, it is thought that nevertheless Mrs. Crocker will be indignant when she learns that the privacy of her home was invaded by the mob. The only thing left uncovered in the house during the invasion was a piano. The charity affair was a frost, but I have not heard of any contributions from the people who did the most grumbling about the change of program. It has been remarked that though they are very active charity workers, their charity consists principally in stimulating the generosity of others.

Why Peter Is Coming

The smart set is already beginning to crane its elastic neck. The hopes of Mrs. Eleanor Martin are about to be crowned with fruition. Yes, her distinguished Newport daughter-in-law is coming and that's no Patti-farewell. There need be no further misgivings. Peter and his better half are due here in January, and preparations are already under way for the lionizing of the dashing Lily Martin. But the preparations may prove to be premature, for young Mrs. Martin doesn't relish the prospect of contributing to the gayety of a provincial holiday by lending herself as the piece de resistance. Some time ago, when Peter was being urged to tear himself away from Newport, his wife confided to a friend that she was reluctant to make the trip, because she would be expected to receive members of our heterogeneous society and also to return the calls, and she hated to be bored. Since it has been known that the Martins had decided to make the trip the rumor has been current that it was a case of necessity; that Peter's bank account was in a state of collapse. Going the Newport pace as Peter did is frightfully expensive. I have heard that he made the pace to the tune of ten thousand a month, and he has no mines in Montana. It was reported that his revenue came from an oil well in Texas, but it didn't. Mrs. Eleanor Martin knows where it came from and she won't tell because she doesn't like to discuss the matter. However, to Peter's credit it should be said, he sustained in Newport the reputation of California and the Martin family for hospitality, and he is coming home for encouragement.

To the student of human nature a most interesting study is afforded by watching the faces of people returning from the races. One can tell at a glance those who have been successful or otherwise. The lucky ones generally repair to one of the well known restaurants up town to refresh the inner man. Of all this contingent the traveled racing man can always be picked out because, as it is essential to him to have a clear head for the next day's business, he invariably winds up his dinner with that healthiest and choicest of all imported champagnes—Ayala.

The Transplanted Ear

[Note: A wealthy Eastern man who had lost an ear recently paid five thousand dollars to another man for an aural appendage which was successfully transplanted.]

The speakers are the Ear that was Always There (One) and the Transplanted One (Two):

One: What a lovely day it is. Nature breathes nothing but love and harmony.

Two: I'm wondering how the taters are growing in the field at home.

One: I know nothing of such plebeian things.

Two: What's plebeian? Got anything to do with the price of pork?

One: You're an interloper in society.

Two: Well, I didn't want to come here. I was forcibly brought to this part of the world.

One: Hark to the strains of the piano. Isn't that Chopin nocturne divine?

Two: What's that? I thought it was a new kind of dinner gong.

One: You're hopeless, I fear. How do you ever expect to get along in society if you don't know Chopin from a dinner-gong?

Two: I don't want to know. I wish I were back on my old man's head.

One: That's Mrs. Exclusive over there. Listen, and you'll hear how much she gave for that diamond tiara.

Two: I'd rather know how the children's shoes hold out this winter.

One: Children? There are no children here.

Two: More's the pity.

One: Hopeless, hopeless!

The Owner of the Transplanted Ear experiences strange sensations:

Now, I always enjoyed music, but somehow that Chopin nocturne doesn't sound as it used. I seem to feel a yearning for "Old Dan Tucker," a common melody I forgot the sound of years ago. (Turns head.) It sounds divine now—how odd it is! (To neighbor at table): Would you mind repeating that remark? I caught the words but they seemed to convey nothing to me. I wonder if my memory is failing me. Such a strange chaos is going on in my mind. I seem to comprehend nothing that is said, yet I hear every word. This society jargon is like a foreign language to me. Yet when I listen to my right-hand neighbor I am quite at home. She is speaking in French, too. My left-hand neighbor must be writing me down a fool.

The Guests, on their homeward way:

I believe our host is going crazy. He said the queerest things. I wonder if he drinks too much—or it might be opium.

And the man never knew. —The Surgeon.

Mr. A. J. Frankland of Chicago, who for many years was connected with The Inter Ocean of that city, has accepted the management of the advertising department of The Evening Post. Mr. Frankland, although a young man, has enjoyed a successful career in the Eastern advertising field, and will no doubt do well in the work he has undertaken.

The Stage

Lulu's Autobiography

To write an autobiography. It has always seemed to me that only the most confirmed egotists would ever attempt such a thing and I hesitate as to how to begin. Of course I know that we of the stage are supposed to be fond of seeing our names in print, and no doubt this is so of all of us, but not more so than of the rest of humanity. I will confess that I am above suspicion in this respect, especially if nice things are being said about me, but to write about myself—that is quite different. And why should anyone be interested in "little me"? My stage career has not been so different from that of many others. While I have always loved my work, it was not from that fact alone that I became a member of the theatrical profession, but from the stern, hard necessity of doing something to earn a living. To tell of my career on the stage? It seems so small, so limited, that there is very little to tell. My first engagement was with Francis Wilson, in the ranks of the "Merry Merry." Mr. Wilson was very kind to me and gave me a chance to under-study Miss Marie Jansen, who was then his leading lady. But Miss Jansen was at that time so distressingly healthy that I did not dream of ever being called upon to play her part, and I went on the even tenor, or rather soprano, of my way, practically dismissed the whole thing from my mind, and was satisfied to do my tra la la's with the other girls of the chorus. It is the unexpected that always happens, however, and that, too, when one is least prepared. It was in New York city at the Broadway theatre that it all happened. New York, of all places! If it had been Cohoes, or Schenectady, or sleepy old Philadelphia——. But New York, dear old New York, the lair of the dramatic critic, where knives are long and sharp for the poor actor. Wilson was at that time playing "The Merry Monarch." On this particular evening I arrived at the theatre about seven-thirty and was met at the door by the stage manager. "Miss Glaser," said he, "we have just received word that Miss Jansen is too ill to play tonight, and you must go on for her part." I rebelled at once. "I simply cannot do it," said I. "Go on without a rehearsal? It is impossible." "But you must," he said. "The house is sold out and Mr. Wilson insists that you must play the part, and says he will help you through." I went to my room in a terrible state, I can assure you. The other girls brought me Miss Jansen's costumes and helped me to dress, and then what do you think happened? Just before the time came for me to go on, I was taken with a deathly nausea and I had to be almost carried to the place where I was to make my first entrance. They literally pushed me on, and for a moment the audience, the theatre and my fellow players all swam before me in a giddy whirl. Finally the time came for my cue. In an instant all was changed. As soon as I opened my mouth, my self-possession returned, and they do say that I made a "hit" that night. At any rate it was the turning-point of my career and I bade farewell to the chorus. I did not, however, get the position as leading lady of the company at once. I was not formally installed until later in the season, and it was in this town of San Francisco that I was selected to permanently occupy the position made vacant by the final retirement of Miss Jansen. I remained in Mr. Wilson's company for several years, playing the principal female roles in all his productions. I then retired from that organization to be at the head of my own company. I appeared as a star in "Sweet Anne Page," a delightful opera and part. Then, in "The Prima Donna," and now in "Dolly Varden." "Dolly Varden" is a very good play and part, and one that I like immensely, and what is still better, the public likes it, too. This encourages managers and box-office men to say that I am a good attraction, which is very sweet of them. I am not going to play "Dolly Varden" forever, however. I expect to have another opera next year which I hope will be equally well liked by the public, the managers and the box-office men. Which reminds me that I am also requested to say something of my aim in life, as far as my profession is concerned. It is to produce worthy musical plays or comic operas. I know it has been said that comic opera is a thing of the past, but I am one whose experience has been that this is not so. For my part I believe that the public taste for the so-called musical comedies is on the wane and that there will be a gradual revival in the field of romantic light operas. That this movement has already begun seems to be the universal opinion of writers in general on dramatic and musical subjects. Lulu Glaser.

Among Columbia futures are Mansfield in "Heidelberg" and "Ivan the Terrible" and Clara Bloodgood in "The Girl with the Green Eyes."

Marie Heath a Real "Little Sunbeam"

If "For Mother's Sake" were put in the hands of one of our good stock companies, it would be a paying play. By the company presenting it at the Grand it suffers. It has a wholesome plot and book, and its settings are pretty, but the characters are very ill-treated by their exponents. Marie Heath, however, is an an exception. She is all her advance notices claimed for her, and with a much more attractive personality than her pictures betray. She makes a capital boy, her characterization being perfect even to the shrill voice of a fourteen-year-old lad. Another exception to the general mediocrity of the cast is Adelaide Plunkett, who enacts the role of the old maid very cleverly. "For Mother's Sake" is far too excellent a play to be consigned to road oblivion. I shall look to see it transferred to the repertories of stock companies.

A Sketch that Doesn't Bore

There is an aggregation of talent at the Orpheum this week such as I have seldom seen crowded into one night's entertainment. The feature that pleased me most is the sketch entitled "The Cattle Queen"; it is so different from the average vaudeville comedietta. When Miss Redding appeared as the girl from Texas I summoned all the patience at my command, and, Job-like, resolved to remain passive. But the plot had scarcely begun to thicken when I emerged from my self-imposed cold storage and sat up and took notice. It was not that I cared for any possible denouement, or that the piece aroused interest in any dramatic complications. It was simply the dialogue. Here was a vaudeville piece whose lines fairly sparkled and scintillated. Some of the witticisms were more than reminiscent, but on the whole they were refreshing and effervescent. It is one of the few vaudeville sketches that I have seen that do not depend on the talent of the mummers for their success. It is almost actor-proof. Next to "The Cattle Queen," Clarice Vance is entitled to the greatest amount of admiration. She is an exceptionally artistic dialect singer, and her coon songs are gems. The perennial Pauline Hall adds charm to the program. Pauline is not a wonderful vocal artist, but she has a graceful figure and uses her voice discreetly, which is something to be thankful for these days, since some of the most persistent howlers are not only generously applauded by our music hall patrons, but are venerated by their managers, and have the satisfaction of having their most dismal yelps pronounced "cornet tones" by the critics. Pauline knows her limitations and never howls. The palm for pulchritude at the Orpheum this week belongs not to the human species. "Bonner," the buxom black horse, is an easy winner.

Where Melodrama Is Well Done

"New York Day by Day" was uniquely advertised. Its posters announcing a big reward for the recovery of a lost woman attracted many rubbering passers-by, and helped draw the big audiences that have filled the Central this week. Half the success of the melodramatic productions at this theatre are due to the fine casts allotted them, and half to the fine scenery and mechanical effects. Those who thought the chariot race in "Ben Hur" a stupendous piece of stage mechanism should see some of the scenic effects the Central's mechanical force is responsible for. "New York Day by Day" has several startling scenes, and the cast throughout is fully able to cope with the strenuous acting necessary to bring out the situations.

The Wizard of Broadway

Dave Belasco is surely the most wonderful of all contemporary craftsmen engaged in contributing to the stage. There may be more intellectual and cultured playwrights, and there are unquestionably dramatists who have a greater knack for creating character, but among all his contemporaries there is not one who is as sure of his touch, who is as accomplished as a promoter of action, or as skilled in the devices that appeal to the eye and quicken the pulse. Mr. Belasco is at once a playwright and a stage manager. He is artificial but at all times realistic. Mr. Belasco never fathers a failure. Everything that comes from his workshop is a success. "Du Barry" was the sensation of its day, but its glory was eclipsed by the superior radiance of "The Darling of the Gods," a play that was both unique and startling, and now comes "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" which was tried on the dog in Washington last week, and which is said to be destined for as long a run as anything Mr. Belasco ever wrote. A correspondent writes me that it is one of the most charming plays that has been seen in this country for years. It has stage pictures which for realism and magnificence of detail far outshine the glories of all other Belasco productions. It has a war story running through it, and it presents some very audacious situations. The star of the piece is Henrietta Crosman who limped into New York with a road company, penniless and unknown, two years ago, and electrified Broadway with her performance of Nell Gwynne. She is now one of the foremost American actresses. Belasco, by the way, is today the most successful manager in American theatrical circles. Other managers have been losing money this season. He is coining money. All his stars—Mrs. Carter, Miss Bates, and Dave Warfield—are drawing well in his plays, and now Henrietta Crosman, lately added to his galaxy, is going to swell his bank account.

Norma Whalley in London

Norma Whalley, known here as an Orpheum attraction, with Walter Jones, the comedian, and later with her husband, Sherrie Matthews, in the Matthews Bulger company, is now in London playing a very small part in George Edwardes' "The School Girl." But she is to be cast for a big role in "Mme. Sherry," to be produced by him in December. Miss Whalley is suing Mr. Matthews for a divorce. He is now a hopeless ataxic in a New York sanitarium. She has been most devoted to him during their short marriage. Her first husband was Charles Erin Verner, the well-known Irish actor.

Burton Holmes Coming in January

Those who attended the lectures of Burton Holmes last season will be glad to learn that he will again visit San Francisco for two weeks, during which time he will give two parallel courses of five lectures each, "The Yosemite Valley," "The Yellowstone Park," "The Grand Canyon of Arizona," and two of Alaska; Norway, Russia, Siberia, China and Corea. These will be given at the Lyric during the two weeks beginning January tenth.

Why the Managers Have Suffered

Though a great deal is being said these days of theatrical failures in the East, it is admitted by the critics that only one good play has suffered and that one is Guimera's "Marta of the Lowlands." But it dealt with peasant life in a remote province of Spain, and the leading part was not well acted. A glance through the playhouses of Broadway will reveal a multitude of pieces in which life counts for nothing and the archaic tricks of the playhouse everything. The simple fact is that the managers have been overdoing the dramatized novel, besides creating a supply of theatrical entertainment greater than the demand. Last season several new houses were opened in New York and it was thought the limit had been reached for years, but this season six new ones began bidding for public patronage. So perhaps after all the theatrical slump told of in despatches should not be attributed to Wall street depression. Too many theatres and not a sufficient number of competent playwrights sums up the situation.

Tyndall's Extraordinary Powers

The longer Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall enlightens the thinking people of San Francisco, the larger grow his audiences. His "Proofs of Immortality" left nothing but standing-room in Steinway hall last Sunday night, and very little of that. With plain, logical proofs, he demolished the most laboriously constructed materialistic foundations. Tomorrow night he will give an interesting discourse on "Our Common Birthright," with many new and some startling tests in telepathy and thought-transference. Many, among the professions, who have been Tyndall's pupils, have requested him to locate here permanently, and open a school of "New Thought" for the proper direction of the mind, but he has not decided yet whether he will do so. On December twentieth he will lecture on "A Night of Mystery."

Patti Gives Us Hot Air

Patti is loyally carrying out her statement that she would wear a new Parisian gown, and a different one, at every concert she is to give in this country. This is not a part of her agreement with Grau; it is simply a voluntary action on her part without any compulsion whatever. She thought that the women of the country would feel a certain interest in this somewhat novel way of presenting herself. At each concert in New York and Philadelphia she wore a fresh gown. Patti has been in high spirits ever since her arrival. She compares the American climate to the exhilaration of champagne and says that it has the same effect on her.

Irving Reduces the Tariff

For the first time in his American career Sir Henry Irving has reduced the price of seats from three dollars to two-fifty for his road tour, which, by the way, does not extend this far. Times have changed since Irving first came to this country. In the old days people cheerfully paid three dollars a seat because he produced his plays on a scale of magnificence which surpassed anything that we had ever seen. Now there are several American producers whose extravagance is far greater than that of Irving. However, I believe that Sir Henry could crowd any local playhouse for two weeks of repertoire at three dollars a seat. There is only one Irving.

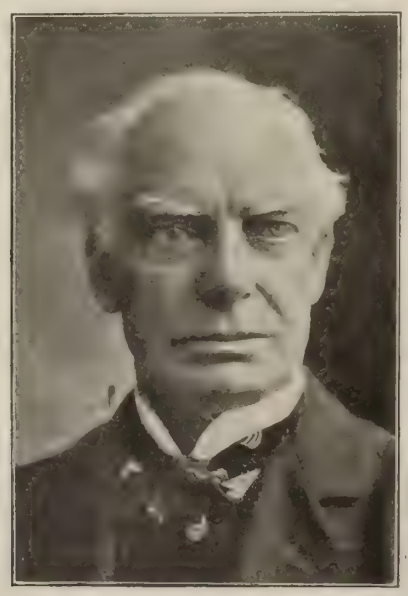
Stoddart in Reminiscent Mood



J. H. Stoddart, the veteran actor who came to town the other day, to prepare for his opening at the Grand in "The Bonnie Brier Bush," met some of his old cronies in a down-town cafe, and growing reminiscent chatted away in this strain:

"It was in 1854 that I arrived in this country, and I was a good deal of a youngster then. It seems to me as if I had always been upon the stage, for you know my first appearance was when I was six years old. My father was an actor of more or less importance in Edinburgh, and for more than twenty years appeared at one of the leading theatres, playing the old comedies and Shakespeare repertoire. I left him when I was a boy and toured through England and Scotland, but it was a precarious sort of life, and I determined to seek my fortune in America. Those were days when we did not know much about your country. It was a vast indefinite something, somewhere across the water, where every boy of brawn and pluck might strike out with his good right arm and battle his way toward fame and fortune. Being an actor of rather doubtful histrionic reputation, I was impecunious. So when I started on my voyage, it was on one of the slow packets, where I had ample opportunity to loll about for days in the shadow of its spreading canvas and dream of hope and despair. All this led me to the conclusion that I would quit the stage and become a man of affairs. But, bless your heart, the minute I got into New York, I made directly for the theatre as if I had been led with a chain. I saw the elder Wallack and he gave me an engagement, not important, but still a start. In my modest way I was successful and remained there for twenty years. Those were in the good old days of the splendid stock company, and my! what a company that was. I was associated with Laura Keene, Lester Wallack, Lysander Thompson, and others who made up the really best company I have ever seen. Mr. Wallack was a great favorite in New York, but he had a powerful rival in William F. Burton, who also had a splendid company. In those days we played Shakespeare and the old English comedies year in and year out. A new play was an event, and was not always heralded or received with favor. People, I think, then had a better conception of the good things in the drama than they have now, but they had more time, and nowadays the public very properly wants the lighter stuff to offset the more serious aspects of the drama. Comic opera and musical comedy were unheard of then, and when I came to New York, the only entertainment of the kind in the city was Christy's Minstrels, which was a very crude entertainment as compared to the minstrel performances of the present day."

The Grand Old Man of the American stage, who will begin a week's engagement at the Grand Opera House tomorrow night in "The Bonnie Brier Bush."

LULU GLASER

As "Dolly Varden" at the Columbia.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Harry Girard will be in Lulu Glaser's "Dolly Varden" company that opens at the Columbia next week. "Dolly Varden" is said to be quite a catchy comic opera. It was written for Miss Glaser by Stanislaus Stange and Julian Edwards. It has been found necessary to explain that the heroine is not Dolly Varden of Dickens's "Barnaby Rudge" but quite a different person. Some charming costumes are worn by Miss Glaser in the part. The orchestra will be doubled during the engagement and will be conducted by W. E. MacQuinn, formerly leader of the orchestra at the Boston Museum.

"The Bonnie Brier Bush" will be given at the Grand with the same company that presented it at the Columbia. It is one of those simple yet charming life sketches that no one should fail to see. There will be no matinee at the Grand tomorrow, Stoddart's engagement opening with the evening performance. The following Sunday May Stockton in "A Little Outcast" will appear at the regular matinee.

"The Girl I Left Behind Me" is always a splendid drawing card. It is a play of human interest and will pack the Alcazar during its engagement.

"I. O. U." shows no signs of tiring the patrons of Fischer's, and will be continued.

The Central's attraction next week will be out of the ordinary. It is "The Scout's Revenge," a thrilling drama of adventure, and will be given a magnificent cast and setting.

"Joan Haden's" first appearance on any stage but that of society will be made at the Orpheum next week. Miss Haden will pose in an entertainment of her own creation, formed of copies of famous paintings, all about love. A living Cupid will assist the beautiful San Francisco girl in her original stunt. Songs and music have been specially arranged to harmonize with unique light effects and different costumes will be worn in each picture representing the Cycle of Love. Lotta and Belle Tobin, also San Francisco girls, will be on the Orpheum's bill. They play on a variety of instruments. Henri Humberti, a comedy juggler, will be another attraction. The Orpheum Road Show will be here December twentieth.

At the Chutes will be Esmeralda, xylophone and bell soloist; Al. H. Tyrrell, "the funny little feller," in amusing songs and stories; Ferry, "the human frog," just from Australia, and the Harrison brothers, comedy sketch artists.

The Press Club benefit at Fischer's next Tuesday afternoon will draw a packed house.

Louis H. Eaton will give his twentieth free organ recital at Trinity church next Monday evening. Wm. F. Zech, violin, and Louis von der Mehden, 'cello, will assist in an interesting trio for organ, violin and 'cello. The combination is unusual and Rheinberger has written a beautiful work, which is a novelty on the Pacific coast. The other numbers on the program are the second trio sonata by Bach, Nocturne in A by Faulkes (new), and a Funeral March from "Grania and Diarmid," which was sent Mr. Eaton by Dr. Elgar, the composer.

Though Samuel Adelstein's name has frequently appeared on concert programs, the mandolinist has not for years given a concert of his own. Therefore the musicale he announces for next Thursday evening in Steinway hall will be an event of interest. Mr. Adelstein will be assisted by some of his pupils; Miss Elena Roeckel, contralto; Edward A. Thornton, tenor, and H. Warner Sherwood, the marvelous boy soprano.

Those of us who remember the dismal howlings of the handsome Marcia Van Dresser a few years ago, with the Bostonians, will be amazed to hear that she is now a member of Herr Conreid's forces, singing such parts as one of the Valkyrs in "Die Walkure." Our old friend Agostini of the Tivoli grand opera company, happened in New York just in time to jump on in the role of the duke in "Rigoletto," the great Caruso having succumbed to the American climate.

An Actor's Bereavement

There are times when the actor must stifle his sense of personal sorrow and sacrifice feeling to duty. Luke Conness of the Alcazar company was playing with a heavy heart last week, having received news on Wednesday of his aged mother's sudden death in Kansas City. The time required for travel was too great to permit him to attend the funeral, and there was no one to replace him in the cast of "A Poor Relation."

Mrs. Lotta Day Coleman has returned from New York, where she had the good fortune to place both a play and a novel. Mrs. Coleman is the author of "When the Heart was Young," the rural drama that had its premier at the Alcazar a season or so back.

JULIET CROSBY.

For the first time in several months, Juliet Crosby will be seen at the Alcazar in next week's production of "The Girl I Left Behind Me." Her artless and unaffected personation of Lucy Hawkesworth has been much admired in the past. So excellent and versatile an artiste should be seen oftener by the public which holds her in such high esteem.

The Wearisome Dramatized Novel

Somebody has had the boldness to dramatize Mrs. Humphrey Ward's "Lady Rose's Daughter." The average Ward novel is a nightmare to people of average intelligence, but her commonplace fiction dealing with utterly superfluous English society and political life should appeal in dramatic form to the soft-headed theatregoers of San Francisco who were unable to appreciate "Iris." Such is the taste of the feminine readers of today that this platitudinous portrayer of merely snob life and snob philosophy is hailed as one of the geniuses of the age. Moreover our critics, incapable of perceiving the larger meaning of Pinero, are shocked at his subtle, wholesome philosophy and applaud the perverted sentimentality of Mrs. Ward. I am pleased to know that the dramatization of "Lady Rose's Daughter" was a frost in New York. There is hope for Broadway. People are becoming weary of plays transposed from books. The doom of the dramatized novel is impending. It has been done to death.

The Sceneless Fake

Ben Greet, of "Everyman" fame, who deluded the cultured (?) of San Francisco into the notion that he was giving them Shakespeare a la Shakespeare, threatens to return to this country to give "Twelfth Night" in New York without scenery. Mr. Greet will find that theatrical gold bricks are not disposed of in New York so easily as they are in this city. The absurd notion that there was such a thing as a sceneless Shakespeare has been exploded. Research has proved that the Elizabethan Society is sadly mistaken.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Belasco of the Alcazar go to New York next month and take as guests their nieces, the Misses Sadie Herenghi and Anne Levy, to whom the marvels of the metropolis will be like a glimpse of fairyland, for they are native daughters and their journeyings have never extended beyond the confines of California. This little transcontinental trip has been devised as a somewhat unique Christmas gift by the Belascos, who always like to see other people happy

Whittlesey to Return

The matinee girls of Boston are kneeling in adoration at the shrine of the new idol, our own White Whittlesey, who is coming back here to be starred on the coast by Belasco and Mayer next year. They have surrendered to the sorcery of his grace as the gallant Lysander in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which Nat Goodwin is finding enormously profitable since he escaped from blase, burned-out and burlesque ridden Broadway.

It is the intention of Frohman to present E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe in a series of great Shakespearean revivals next season. —The Playgoer.

In Financial Circles

Bank clearings uniformly all over the country show a falling off and money rates have hardened to an uncomfortable degree. The local demand for money is quite brisk and the banks have assumed an attitude of watchfulness instead of lending encouragement to speculation.

Moneys to the credit of corporations are to be used towards paying dividends and interest on bonded loans at the beginning of the year, and are therefore not considered available by the banks for loan purposes, since we are nearly at the close of the year.

Transactions in "The Stock and Bond Exchange" were as follows: $144,000 bonds and 2719 shares of stock divided in 1789 shares Gas & Electric stock, 365 shares Water stock, 365 shares Miscellaneous stock, 5 shares Savings Bank and 195 shares Sugar stock. The lion's share was done in Gas & Electric and fluctuations, light as they were, simply followed the law of supply and demand. —The Financier.

Automobile Topics

The sum total of the practical value of the automobile for military purposes, in the opinion of Capt. T. Bentley Scott, the military attache to the American Embassy at Paris, expressed in a paper on the subject in the last number of the Outing magazine, is illustrated in the long trains of army wagons drawn by steam tractors which may be seen daily in Paris wending their way to the great subsistence depots. "After all the enthusiasm, all the talk, all the experiments, this convoy of meat and groceries typifies almost absolutely" the limit of the military usefulness of the automobile. So far, the further use of the machine in armies has been "more in the nature of sport than anything else," and its chief advocates have been "not so much military men as sporting men." That the automobile as a tractor "has come to stay," Captain Scott does not doubt; but after careful and special attention to the subject in France, the country where experiments in its military uses can best be conducted, he concludes that in that restricted sphere alone it "will play hereafter a part intermediate between the railway and the draught horse." This conclusion he reaches after an expert argument which seems convincing.

Barney Oldfield has gone back to Ohio, but before leaving he said that he expected to return again in about a year. Like all champions, no matter what their specialty is, Barney has a fascination for the fair sex. When in Los Angeles he aroused the interest of the wife of a prominent millionaire and she tried to persuade him to permit her to ride in Bullet No. 2 just as he was about to enter a race.

It was not long ago that I read in a Ventura daily: "An exchange says that A. E. Joy of Watsonville is the happy possessor of a 25-horse power double-cylinder automobile, with a seating capacity for six persons and a speed anywhere between 50 and 100 miles per hour. Al used to live in Ventura and is an old friend of ours. We are glad to learn that he has had to enlist the services of a crack-a-jack auto in order to keep pace with his increasing business demands in the prolific land of spuds and apples." And a few days ago a letter was received from Mr. Joy, who purchased a Winton touring car, saying that he was having exceedingly good success with the car and that it was the talk of the town. He recently ran twenty-two miles to Salinas from Watsonville in one hour and fifteen minutes and made the same trip back without a single stop in five minutes faster.

Miss Kate Dillon was out last Sunday morning driving her White car all alone and fearlessly through the Presidio, then over to the Park, along the south drive, and out along the ocean boulevard. Miss Dillon doesn't seem the least bit afraid when at the throttle of her carriage, and wants all the speed out of it the law will allow.

It is more than likely that Los Angeles will have an automobile speedway to Del Rey in the near future. The intention is to parallel the Los Angeles and Pacific railway tracks for about seven miles from the beach, and have the road branch into Washington street at some point not yet decided on. The need of such a road to be used exclusively for automobiles has long been urged, and would be a great additional attraction for Easterners visiting the coast. The Del Rey route's directness makes it a very favorable road and more so because of the straightaway run for the last seven miles, over a practically level road on which there would be not more than a dip of fifteen feet in several miles. Then it would tap near the middle of the Long Shore boulevard from Santa Monica to Redondo, which is in course of construction, and it is believed that in the course of time other automobile roads would be built to connect with the Playa Del Rey end of the new road. The entire length of the road would be about eighteen miles. Dr. Milbank Johnson, president of the Automobile Club of Southern California, said that the intention is to build a road of such excellence that automobilists from all over the country and even from Europe would have to come here to make records.

Many of the "choo choo" wagons journeyed to San Jose and back last Sunday on both sides of the bay. Mr. and C. B. Hale took the trip to the Garden City in their Winton. Mrs. R. E. Parrish, Dr. Russell and some friends were seen in a White touring car bound for San Jose on this side.

Among automobilists and parties who drove to San Jose last Sunday on the other side of the bay were President F. A. Hyde, John D. Spreckels and Messrs. Kjelsburg and Lindbloom. All of these drove in their new White touring cars.

When in the East a few weeks ago Mr. Larzelere of the Pacific Motor Car Company secured the services of Mr. F. R. Dorman, who has for several years been in charge of the offices and garage of the American Company of New York and Cleveland. This company has also contracted with Mr. George Sooner of Cleveland to take charge of its machine shops. Mr. Sooner for three years has been the Packard Motor Car Company's expert repair man, traveling to the various Eastern cities to repair and generally overhaul the old machines owned by this company's patrons. The Pacific Motor Car Company has just installed considerable new machinery and has just completed many improvements in its garage and shops at 49 to 53 City Hall avenue, and with the expert heads of departments will undoubtedly be able to do a very satisfactory garage business.

The Packard Motor Car Company has just built and completed the largest automobile factory in America at the cost of $1,100,000. —The Chauffeur.

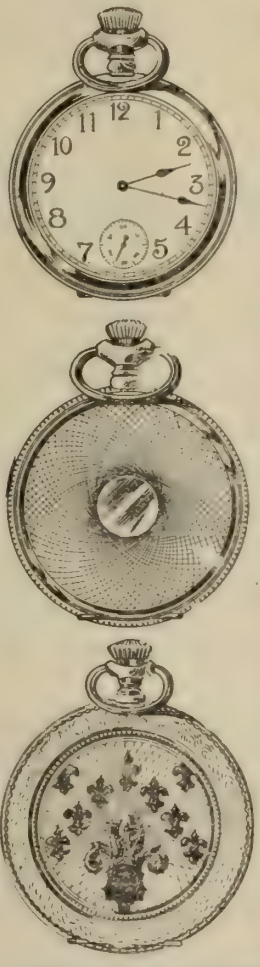
Inconsequent Woman!

Her Soliloquy at His Wedding.

Of course I would not stay away. I suppose plenty of people—his relatives particularly—were looking for my absence. But here I am. I look stunning, too. This gown hasn't a duplicate for style and cut in this church today. (Looks about her with keen gaze.) No, indeed, even the modish Mrs. Saylor is outdone by this frock. I know I never looked better.

What a mob! Well, when these parvenu families get a daughter married, they like to splurge and have all their calling-list in to see the show. Must have spent a thousand on the flowers alone. I wonder how Reggy likes all this sort of thing? He always said a quiet wedding suited his taste. What a change must have taken place in his disposition!

I wonder why a feeling of sadness comes over me when I think of Reggy marrying another girl? I did not love him a little bit. All his impassioned pleadings moved me not at all. My pulses never moved a trifle faster when he was with me. Yet Reggy was a charming lover. He said the sweetest things, paid the most delicate compliments in a way that never offended. I wonder if his bride-to-be appreciates Reggy? I hate to have that high-bred, clever fellow thrown away on a new-rich. I haven't a doubt that her mother made the match. Poor Reggy hasn't a penny beyond his salary, but he's got loads of blood and social position.



There's his mother. She's always had a grudge against me because I turned her precious son down. But mercy! one can't marry a man one doesn't love, even if he has a lovely manner and makes love in a charming way. There's that hateful Snodgrass woman and her brood of ugly daughters. (Smiles and bows across the aisle.) There! I suppose they think Reggy jilted me for this moneyed girl. I can't stand up and bellow to the world that I'm not a jilted maiden, that I didn't want Reggy, and that's the whole matter in a nutshell. What a vulgar saying "wearing the willow" is. Half the women here are applying it to me, I can tell by the curious looks cast in my direction—nasty things! Well, my heart's not on my sleeve for daws to peck at. It's a smartly-cut sleeve, too—not a woman here has a sleeve of such chic cut. And the arm it covers is a well-moulded one, if I do think it, who shouldn't.

What's that the organist is playing? Oh, yes, that sweet serenade. How many times Reggy and I have listened to that serenade together. I wonder if the future Mrs. Reggy is musical? Reggy would hate any one who was not. He's musical and artistic down to the ground.

Well, I must sit up and take notice now. That's the bride's mother coming in now—common-looking woman. I wonder how Reggy, with his refinement, can stand such relatives-in-law? A pity I couldn't have given him my people for in-laws. If I do say so, my father and mother cannot be beat in this city.

The first strains of the "Bridal Chorus." How nervous poor Reggy must be—I can fancy his knees shaking and his hands trembling. There come the bridesmaids. Well, the bride's cleverer than I thought her—she's picked out the homeliest girls I ever saw, and one never sees any beauties among bridesmaids. The brides know better than to do anything so rash. I see they each wear a diamond clover-pin—wonder how Reggy's pocket-book stood the strain? Their frocks are frights—I wonder if those frocks were her taste? If so, I pity Reggy.

The maid-of-honor's not so bad. That's a Parisian gown, I'm sure. Well, I'm thankful for Reggy's sake that his bride's not stingy. Generosity might condone lack of taste in dress. (Cranes neck.) Here's the bride. Can't see her face, but her gown's elaborate enough for a Drawing Room. She's not ungraceful, either; carries herself quite well, considering. And there's Reggy at the altar. How pale the dear old chap looks. My sympathy goes out to him.

(Ceremony proceeds.) What a short affair—and what a change it makes in one's life. I wonder if I'll ever care enough for a man to stand up before the altar with him, and promise to love, honor and obey until death do us part? Voila—not yet, not yet.

(Bridal party passes.) Why, she is not bad-looking. She's got no style, but there's something winning about her. She looks shy and happy, so happy. She loves him, I can tell. And Reggy? Why, he looks happy, too. He loves her! How quickly a man forgets. What a proud look that was he cast upon her as she took his arm—what an air of fond proprietorship.

(Smiles and bows at people going out.) It was a pretty wedding after all. (Sighs.) But how sad weddings make one feel. Now, I can't understand why I feel sad—I refused Reggy—I didn't love him. And yet—and yet—(sighs again)—perhaps I'm sad because, now that he loves another, he must be glad that I said no!

The Sins of the Sinless

(A Clubwoman's Dream.)

A very modest but good clubwoman, who had a very high opinion of her friends' virtues, dreamed that she died and went heavenward. To reach the gates of Paradise she had to climb a great many stairs, and about half way up she was accosted by a white-bearded old man.

"Who are you?" she asked.

"I am St. Peter," he answered.

Then he gave her a box of chalk and told her to walk up the stairs and she would come to a room where she would find several blackboards.

"One of these is marked with your name," he said, "and you must take this chalk and check off your sins."

The woman followed directions, meditating meanwhile on the errors of her past, and wondering what her immaculate friends would think of her when they saw her blackboard with its record of peccadilloes.

She had mounted but a few steps when she met one of the most irreproachable of her friends coming down.

"Why, where are you going, Mrs. Galabad?" asked the modest and good woman. "Are you not going to mount higher?"

"Later on, perhaps," responded the other, "but I had to come down for more chalk."

The final concerts of Ellery's Italian Band will be given today and tomorrow afternoons and nights at the Alhambra. The "Rag-Time" smoker scheduled for tonight is attracting great attention. The additional attraction is a troup of Dalmatian swordsmen en route to the St. Louis Exposition. They give a sensational drill and sham battle, using two swords as in the olden times. The performance represents a combat between Moors and Turks and the entire drill and contest is with musical accompaniment. This is the first appearance of the organization in this country in public, though they appeared at the Olympic Club during the week where their entertainment was considered marvelous. It is something entirely new in this country.

Eleanor Haber in Monologue

A very large audience, including members of the various women's clubs, attended the monologue recital given by Eleanor Haber last Friday night. These recitals are entirely new here, though Miss Hereford has made them very popular in New York. They are a series of pictures of contemporary life, little sketches of every day existence dealing with happenings that might occur to any one of us. Miss Haber's monologues were all new, some arranged by herself and others specially written for her. A change of costume accompanied each monologue, and a bit of scenic effect that added to the interest. The monologues dealt with a book canvasser, Mrs. Benton's Easter bonnet, a girl graduate, a matinee girl buying theatre tickets, and a society woman's "informal" tea. They were all bright and amusing, the comedy element pervading every one. Miss Haber has gained very much in poise since the recital she gave before going to New York. This improvement is especially noticeable in her facial expression and in her carriage, which has a repose which only comes from experience. There was no opportunity in the selections given to show the reader in any but the lighter side of her work; it would be interesting to hear her in something of an emotional nature. Miss Haber was assisted in her program by Albert I. Elkus who played some of his own compositions. Young Elkus has fully borne out in the youth the promise his talent gave when a lad. He is a brilliant and forceful player, combining these qualities with a delicacy rare in a masculine pianist. His compositions show originality out of the common. "The Lady of Shalott" was an especially beautiful thing, full of poetic fancy. Albert Elkus is now eighteen years of age and a Sophomore at the University of California. He has been composing, and studying piano under Hugo Mansfeldt since he was a little boy, and his enthusiasm for his work still continues unabated. He is to be the soloist at the first concert of the Minetti Orchestra on December fourteenth, on which occasion he will play two original compositions and the Liszt legend, "St. Francois marchant sur les Floss."

A Studio Musicale

Mr. Theodor Salmon, who is one of the colony of musicians and artists who have their studios in the Roosevelt building, gave the last of his Friday evening "at homes" last week. These pleasant and artistic little functions will be discontinued until after the holidays. Mr. Salmon was assisted in his program by Miss Eleanor Connell, soprano, and Mr. Alfred Cogswell, baritone. As usual at Mr. Salmon's receptions, the studios of Miss Connell, Mr. Cogswell and Miss Flora Bell, the artist, were also thrown open to the guests. The inmates of this studio building are like one happy family, and all unite when any one of them is holding an "at home." The program presented on Friday night was: Piano, Prelude, E flat, Chopin, Fantasie, Op. 49, Chopin, Mr. Salmon; recitative and aria from "Judas Maccabaeus," Handel, Mr. Cogswell; songs, No one my grief can tell, Tschaikowsky, A Dream, Lassen, Miss Connell; piano, Concert Study, MacDowell, Romanza (by request), Salmon, Mr. Salmon; songs, A Necklace of Love, Nevin, Gipsy John, Clay, Mr. Cogswell; piano, The Brook (by request), Pape, A la bien-aimee, Schutt, Mr. Salmon; duets, Tuscan Folk Songs, Caraccioh, Miss Connell, Mr. Cogswell.

At the musicale on Thursday of last week given by Mrs. Martin Schultz, two of Shafter Howard's latest compositions, "Farewell" and "The Heart's Fancies," were on the program. They were very charming melodies, possessing much musical merit. Mr. Howard is one of our most promising young composers, and he has talent which is bound to win recognition. Mrs. Schultz is a woman of charming presence and she looked stunning at the musicale. She is a church choir singer much admired in Oakland.

LETTERS

It Is Worth While

In "The Shutters of Silence" G. B. Burgin has discovered a novel and unhackneyed plot. A child is born of the illicit love of a young guardsman and the daughter of an English vicar. The mother, being inordinately ambitious, refuses to marry the father of the infant, feeling certain that, as no suspicion of wrong conduct has been attached to her, she can do better for herself than to wed poverty. Her tropic passion is quenched after the first flare of the flame, and partly because her love has turned to hatred, and she can cause suffering to the father who loves his little son, partly because the child resembles her so closely that it may excite surmise, she turns him over to the tender mercies of two profligate wretches about to emigrate to Canada. Maternal affection she has not, and out of her sight the child is no more to her than a superfluous kitten doomed to drowning. Half starved and otherwise abused, the little waif makes his escape and in the midst of a storm he is found, nearly frozen to death, at the gate of a Trappist monastery. He is taken in and cared for by the monks, and being unclaimed and evidently unwanted elsewhere, he remains there, becoming a lay brother of the order, and anxious to take the final vows of renunciation. It is here that he is finally discovered by his father, reclaimed from his life of voluntary renunciation, and taken abroad into the social life of London. In some respects Harry Winchester is as pathetic a picture as old Dr. Manette of "A Tale of Two Cities," for, as Brother Colombe of the Mahota monastery, he knows nothing of luxury. Warm baths, soft clothing, animal food and luxurious sleeping accommodations are as foreign to his experience as the society of women, freedom of speech and esthetic surroundings. But in spite of his unfortunate birth the boy is of good blood, quick of understanding and of a grave and respectful demeanor, which makes him a sharp contrast to others with whom he comes in contact. When a youth has grown into his twentieth year without having seen a woman's face since his earliest boyhood, so that he has almost forgotten that there are such creatures, it is inevitable that he should have strange experiences. The women of the social world are various in kind and quality, and young Harry meets those of the two extremes. As a matter of course, he falls in love, and equally as a matter of course, there are obstacles athwart his path. What the nature of them is, and whether Harry decides to renounce the world with all its snares and temptations, and take up again his life as Brother Colombe, or whether he will stand up for a second round after being floored—whether the influence of seven years of seclusion and prayer, or one of life and activity is to prove the stronger, is just what Mr. Bergin has told and what readers must discover for themselves. The author has not attempted to poach upon the field of Rev. Charles Sheldon and others of the "What Would Christ Do?" fraternity, but he has shown that simplicity, directness and innocence will often accomplish what threats and force fail to do. The young ex-monk was not hampered by any of the fine-spun theories of what the world would say, and whether things would look well, or by any far-fetched notions of complicated, hair-splitting justice and equity. To him an action was right or wrong, just or unjust, and he ranged himself at once on the proper side. But lest any one should be turned aside by the idea that he was a pious young prig with nothing heavier than a verse of scripture to hurl at an opponent, it may be well to hint that one of his first victories was over an exorbitant Montreal hackman, and more than once in his social career his knuckles gave evidence of coming into contact with something more substantial than a kid glove. The story itself is good; it is well told, and it is infinitely more wholesome than the majority of the volumes issued from the Smart Set Press. Even in this day of the multiplication of books "The Shutters of Silence" deserves attention.

Wonderful discoveries are made by the amateur literary editor—the new sweetheart or little sister variety. One of them last week spoke of Louis Becke as "a new and popular Australian writer," and called "The Octopus" Frank Norris's first novel. What a treat there is in store when, some time, with a day off, the infant stumbles upon "Vanity Fair," or "The Virginians," or "David Copperfield." And there are "Middlemarch," and "Mill on the Floss," and two or three more. There really were books written before the days of best-sellers. Not that one has a quarrel with a belated discovery of Louis Becke or Frank Norris, or Joseph Conrad. Better late than never, but for pity's sake, why advertise ignorance? Why not look up the record and find out whether the book in hand is a first effort or whether it is the first of importance, or only the first that the reader has encountered?

The first free library was established about two hundred and seventy years ago at Wimborne, in England, when a clergyman donated two hundred and forty ponderous volumes to his parish. The volumes were fastened by chains three feet long, so that they could be removed from the shelves to reading desks below for the convenience of those who wished to consult them, but not taken from the building. Some of the volumes are so valuable that today they justify the precaution. —The Bookworm.

Good Ideas

From "The Making of an American," by Jacob I. Riis:

It was never a safe plan to lie. It never did work out right, not once. I have found the only safe plan to be to stick to the truth and let the house come down if it must. It will come down anyhow.

I don't care two pins for all the social theories that were ever made unless they help to make better men and women by bettering their lot.

Two can battle with a fit of homesickness much better than one, even if never a word is said about it.

Providence has a way of ranging itself on the side of the man with the strongest battalions of resources when the emergency does come.

When there are two sides to a thing, it is not difficult to get at the right of it in an argument and to carry public opinion for the right. But when there is absolutely nothing to be said against a proposed reform, it seems to be human nature—American human nature, at all events—to expect it to carry itself through with the general good wishes but no particular lift from any one. It is a very charming expression of our faith in the power of the right to make its own way, only it is all wrong: it will not make its way in the generation that sits by to see it move. It has got to be moved along, like everything else in this world, by men. That is how we take title to the name. That is what is the matter with half our dead-letter laws. The other half were just stillborn.

Oh for irregularity enough to throttle precedent finally and for good!

It does seem as if the chance of getting something for nothing is, on the whole, the greatest temptation one can hold out to frail human nature, whether in the slum, in Wall street or out where the daisies grow.

Stories Old and New

What He Saved

At a recent fire a fireman came gasping and panting from the burning building with his beard and eyebrows singed in the flames. Under one arm he carried a small but heavy box which he deposited in a place of safety with the air of a man who had saved a box of government bonds from destruction.

"I've saved something valuable, from the heft of it," he exclaimed proudly.

On opening the box, it was found to contain six bottles of a patent fire-extinguisher.

A Comedian's Jest

Mr. Toole was once traveling on the Great Eastern line from Ipswich to Cambridge. The train was a slow one, and the journey in consequence very tedious. When Bury St. Edmunds was reached the comedian was thoroughly wearied out by the length of time the train was delayed at the station. Calling a porter, he asked in a very bland manner for the station-master, who, all politeness, bustled up to the door in which sat Mr. Toole, looking as solemn as a judge.

"What is it, sir?" asked the official.

"At what time is the funeral to take place?" inquired Mr. Toole.

"Funeral, sir—whose funeral?" asked the now wondering station-master.

"Whose funeral?" continued Mr. Toole. "Why, have we not come to Bury St. Edmunds?" —The Raconteur.

The Evolution of Christmas

At first blush it would appear that any people calling themselves by the name of Christian must naturally acknowledge the birthday of Christ, or the day commonly accepted and set apart for the commemoration of that event, as the most important in their religious calendar, and to be celebrated in some manner, either socially or ecclesiastically, though every other festival of the year should pass without notice. Not so, however. When once the idea of protest and reformation took root each successive reformer undertook a larger task of "purification" than his predecessor. It is in the nature of all such movements to become radical and proceed to extremes, hence it is not surprising that many of the sects and subdivisions of sects which arrogated to themselves the exclusive right to declare themselves Christians had all but eliminated the spirit of Christ and Christianity from their creeds.

It was not from Luther, but from the ascetic Calvin that the Puritans derived their ideas of the religious spirit, and none of the traditional characteristics which are connected with the reformed religion are associated with either Martin Luther or Charles Wesley. A lover of children and family life, of nature, of simple pleasures and harmless sport, we do not picture the great Reformer as one who would banish Christmas joys. On the contrary, there is an old print which represents him seated with his wife and family about a table on which stands a lighted Christmas tree. Clustered about the base of the tree are numerous articles, evidently Christmas gifts, and one of the children is apparently singing to the accompaniment of his father's lute. In the corner, by the great German stove, sits the grandmother, with the family cat at her feet, and a child's hoop and stick rest against the wall. But for the quaint costumes and antique furniture, it would readily pass for the picture of many a family gathering of our own day.

In the year 1617 James I made a journey to Scotland to establish the English church with all its forms and observances, and one of the Five Articles in which the king set forth his will proposed that "the festivals of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, Ascension Day and Whit Sunday should be observed in Scotland just as in England." The articles were received with unequivocal signs of displeasure, and many of the churches flatly refused compliance with the revival of Christmas, which was denounced as a return of the pagan Saturnalia. Three years later the Articles were enforced by an act of Parliament. In a little while we shall find Parliament just as active in passing laws to prohibit the celebration of church festivals.

It was in the same year that we find the English Parliament passing laws to enforce the recognition of church holidays that the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth, and it must have been a source of satisfaction and uplifting to these uncompromising protestants against papacy and prelacy that their first work, the felling of trees and hewing of logs for sheltering the little band, was undertaken on Christmas day. One of the chroniclers of the times makes boastful mention that "no man rested all that day." As the stores had begun to run low it was advisable to begin to limit allowances, and one can imagine the grim pleasure which the elders must have found in beginning the restricted diet on the very day which elsewhere was given over to feasting and good cheer. We cannot help a suspicion that the "master who caused us to have some Beere" at night was actuated as much by a lingering recollection of the old Merry Christmas as he was by the fatigue of the unwonted exertion of the day's work.

In 1633 one William Prynne, a Puritan lawyer, published "Histriomastix," in which he denounced plays, masques, balls, the decoration of houses with holly and evergreens, feasting and all other celebrations of Christmas, and was committed to the Tower, prosecuted in the Star Chamber, expelled from the University of Oxford and the Society of Lincoln's Inn. He was also disbarred, compelled to stand in the pillory on two occasions, forfeiting one of his ears each time, while his book was burned before him by the public hangman. In addition to all this he was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment as well as to the payment of a fine of five thousand pounds. But William Prynne was only a few years in advance of his time, for by 1642 we find ordinances issued forbidding the performance of plays at Christmas. In the following year shops were first kept open on that day, and shortly after that parish officers were prosecuted for permitting the decoration of churches. In June, 1647, it was decreed by act of Parliament that the feast of the Nativity of Christ, Easter and Whitsuntide be no longer celebrated, but that servants, aprentices and others be given a holiday on the second Tuesday of each month instead. In Canterbury, on the twenty-second of December in that year, the town crier went about with his bell and proclaimed the abolition of Christmas, and that a market should be held on that day.

It is not to be supposed that the mass of the people accepted these ordinances peaceably. On the contrary, there were riots in every quarter of the kingdom. In Canterbury resolutions were passed declaring that unless Christmas was restored the people would declare for the king and raise an army to fight for the restoration of the monarchy, while the apprentices and servants in London clamored loudly for church services. It is not probable that the apprentices would have been over-zealous in attendance had the services been continued, but they felt that they were being deprived of a right, and declared, not without reason, that making Christmas the only day in the year when no service was held and no sermon preached was in itself an observance of the day by the Puritans, in spite of their prohibitory ordinances. It has always been regarded as a fortunate circumstance for the Parliamentarians that the first Christmas under their rule fell upon Thursday, for if it had happened to occur upon Sunday they would have been placed in an awkward dilemma. They could not have prohibited the regular services on that day, and to have permitted them would have established a precedent for subsequent celebrations.

General Browne, a Presbyterian zealot at Abydon, sent out a proclamation commanding the people to work especially on Christmas day, and one of the newspapers of the time took the stand that God had concealed the date of the birth of Christ for the same reason that the burial place of Moses has ever remained a secret, "so that they might not put an holiness on that day." The writer was in favor of celebrating such occasions as the Fifth of November instead, and in spite of his declaration that God had intentionally concealed the date of the true Christmas he gave it as his opinion that the time fell in September. Meanwhile, in order to prevent a recurrence of the same disturbances in the following years, Parliament took stern measures of repression. During the years of the Puritan ascendency there were no further attempts to celebrate the day publicly, but the authorities very wisely took no notice of what people chose to do privately and in their own homes. All this while the English laws were echoed in the colonies, and Judge Sewell, whose diary has thrown much light upon the early days of American occupation, records gleefully the open stores and the carts which came to town to transact business, and when, many years later, the prohibitory statutes were repealed, he tempers his annoyance by blessing God that there is yet no authority to compel the observance of the day.

The English Christmas was revived with the Restoration, but the spirit of Puritanism survived for two centuries, though not in its virulent form. There are, however, people yet in middle age who can remember little playmates who never hung their stockings for Santa Claus to fill, or plucked the fruit of the Christmas tree, or listened to the immortal story of the jolly saint and his team of reindeer, at the knee of mother or father. In these more liberal times, when Jews and pagans as well as Christians unite at least as far as in making the children happy, it comes upon us sometimes, with a shock, in turning over the pages of reminiscences or of old-time children's books, to realize that the time is so recent when even to exceptional families there was by deliberate design and intention, no Christmas.

But the ups and downs of Christmas have not been all of the Puritanical and prohibitory order, for they have had their comical aspects as well. It was not until 1752 that the New Calendar was adopted in England, and the peasants could not comprehend the necessity for omitting twelve days in the enumeration as anything else but a deliberate attempt to deprive them of nearly a fortnight of their lives. They stood stoutly by the assertion that the day which, according to the new method of calculation, would fall on the sixth of January, and not the twenty-fifth of December, was the proper time for the celebration of the holiday, and they refused to eat the usual mince pies and plum pudding, drink their punch or hold their revels, much less to attend church, on any but the "right" day. The clergy were hard put to it to deal with their parishioners, and the peasants of Buckinghamshire hit upon an original solution of the difficulty. It was claimed, for the occasion at least, that a blackthorn growing near one of the villages was a slip of the flowering thorn of Glastonbury, which, tradition asserts, was the staff of Joseph of Arimathea. After the crucifixion the saint fled, carrying with him the Holy Grail, and as he stopped on Christmas Eve to rest himself against his staff, it took root and burst into bloom. The Glastonbury thorn is popularly believed to send forth blossoms at midnight of the holy eve ever since, and the Bucks peasants determined to leave the solution of their problem to the tree. They set out in a body to watch for the miracle, agreeing that if the thorn blossomed on the night of December twenty-fourth they would accept the following day as Christmas, but if not there should be no observance until twelve days later. They kept their vigil, but were unrewarded for their faith, so at daylight they set out for home in anything but a holiday mood. The rector of the parish met them and ordered them into church, but they refused compliance. He tried to argue them from their stand, but it was useless. They met all his reasoning with the same stolid answer of no flowers, no feast, and not a Bucks peasant would enter a church until the parson agreed to smoke a pipe with them on the only Christmas which they would recognize. Eventually, and perhaps as a matter of convenience, the twenty-fifth day of December came to be celebrated by gentle and simple alike, but it is noteworthy as an example of the tenacity with which the humbler classes cling to tradition, that to this day one may find people of English or Irish origin still referring to the sixth of January as Old Christmas, or Little Christmas day, though they may be removed two generations from the old country.

The Nativity

It was not until the fourth century, A. D., after active persecution of the Christians had ceased, that the first effort to celebrate the Nativity was made. Then it began to be recognized that the life, as well as the death of the Saviour had significance, and that patience under suffering and resignation in death were not the only Christian duties. But when the Church determined to make a festival of the day of the Saviour's birth, it was found that there was not even an approximate record of the date, and no way of determining it. The Gospels give no hint of either day or month, and oral tradition was silent. There were scattered conjectures to be found in the writings of the Fathers, but there was no evidence to turn the scale in favor of one day more than another, while the dates were so widely separated that it was impossible to attempt to reconcile them. Moreover, all were of such a late origin that none could claim to be authoritative. Some held to the twentieth of March, while others considered two months later the proper anniversary, and Clement of Alexandria favored the nineteenth of November. The Eastern church, basing the Incarnation on a liberal interpretation of the first three verses of the first chapter of the prophecy of Ezekiel, celebrated the fifth or sixth of January as the date of the baptism. With such confusion it is evident that there was no better plan to be formulated than to be governed by convenience and symbolic significance and celebrate a day by common consent. The early Fathers did not profess, as some later theologians have done, to be determining chronology and settling history. They did not delude themselves, for a moment, with the idea that the date selected was the actual anniversary of the Incarnation, but there were many reasons why it was satisfactory in both an ecclesiastical and a popular sense. It had long been an assumption that as the earth was commanded to bring forth grass and herbs, the creation had taken place in the spring of the year, and as "the evening and the morning were the first day," it must have been when the days and nights were of equal length, therefore it was not unnatural that the vernal equinox, the twenty-fifth of March, should have been regarded as the actual day upon which the earth was evolved from chaos. With perhaps more piety than logic, it was equally natural to the primitive mind to consider the same day as the most fitting date on which the Immaculate Conception could occur, and a simple counting forward brought them to the twenty-fifth of December as the day of the miraculous birth. Now, the twenty-fifth of December is the winter solstice, the day upon which the light begins to lengthen and the darkness to grow less, and it had already been celebrated as a pagan feast, the birthday of the sun. What more natural than that the minds of the primitive Christians should be impressed with the coincidence of the waning of the spiritual darkness of the world? St. John the Baptist is presumed to have been born on the twenty-fifth of June, the date being determined by the same calculation by which others have been arrived at, and here again, as St. Augustine points out: "Behold, my brethren, another instance of the wondrous fulfillment of Scripture. St. John the Baptist was born on June twenty-fifth, the summer solstice, when the sun begins to decline. The Lord Jesus is born on December twenty-fifth, when the sun begins to ascend, and thus is fulfilled the saying, 'He must increase, but I must decrease.'" The earliest mention of December twenty-fifth as Christmas day occurs in the Calendar of Church Festivals, A. D. 354, but it would seem as though the world had been waiting for an opportunity to celebrate it, for in 360 the people crowded into the churches of Rome, and twenty years later we have an account of the services at Antioch. Fifty years from the first promulgation of Christmas as a church festival it had become the universal practice of Christianity to make it the great holiday of the year, and though there are thousands today who profess no religious belief, or who dispute the divinity of Christ, there is no civilized land, and certainly no household wherein there is a child, which does not make some recognition of the occasion. Higher critics may scorn the childish arguments by which the pious Fathers arrived at their deductions, and the wise and learned may point out the improbability of shepherds watching their flocks in the open fields in mid-winter; it may be proved and proved again that the tax registration of Publius Sulpicius Quirinus was not made in December at all. What the world wants now, as it did fifteen centuries ago, is a common day on which all may unite to celebrate the greatest event in civil and religious history.

In the Dawn of Christianity

It is a noteworthy circumstance that though the birth of Christ is the point upon which the whole Christian religion rests, no reference to the event appears in the art of the first four centuries of the Christian era. Writers and lecturers build fanciful pictures of the primitive church, and of the Christ child and the Holy Family, as though they held always the position amongst the faithful that they do today, but it is rather what they think ought to have been than what records show as the fact. From our present-day viewpoint this seems strange and almost inexplicable, but if we can assume mentally the attitude of the early Christians there is no mystery in the matter. Humanity was not very humane to the first converts to the new religion and the world was a hard home to them. They did not look upon it as a pleasant abiding place, but as literally a vale of tears, and it was not the birthdays, but the days of the deaths of saints and martyrs that were commemorated, for with death they escaped from misery and persecution and entered into the joys of the heavenly kingdom. Origen, one of the early fathers of the church, said: "None of the saints can be found who ever held a feast or a banquet on his birthday, or rejoiced on the day when his son or his daughter was born. But sinners rejoice and make merry on such days, for we find in the Old Testament that Pharaoh, King of Egypt, celebrated his birthday with a feast, and that Herod, in the New Testament, did the same. But the saints not only neglect to mark the day of their birth with festivity, but also, filled with the Holy Ghost, they curse the day, after the example of Job and Jeremiah and David." While the leading teacher of the church held forth in this manner, we cannot expect to find the Christians thinking of the Nativity as a joyous occasion, and so the event which we now look upon as the most important in the world's history, the fulfillment of the prophecies of the Old Testament, the personal entrance of God into humanity, the visible coming of the Saviour who was to redeem the world, was not looked upon as an occasion of supreme importance. It was not the humanity, but the divinity of Christ which engaged the attention. It was not the birth of the Saviour, but his death, which was to redeem the world. It was not through His life, but through His death that they expected to be saved. He was born only that he might die. It was not the Incarnation, but the Crucifixion and Resurrection which were to be final proof of his Messiahship. The Christian church did not spring into being ready-made as by the deliberations of a conclave or convention; the systems of doctrine were elaborated slowly, and the sequence and relative importance of church festivals were not determined at once, and since the principal article of faith and hope was the redemption of mankind through the death of Christ, it was but natural that Easter should be the crown of the year. Then, too, none of the Disciples and Apostles had known the Holy Family. None of them had seen the Child Jesus, a helpless infant in his mother's arms, nor had they observed him at play in the shop of Joseph, the carpenter, as a boy, or rendering such assistance as he could as a youth. In only one of the Gospels is there a dwelling with any degree of tenderness on the early years of Jesus. The Epistles antedate the Gospels, and it was not the poverty and humility of the earthly life, but the splendor and glory of the heavenly kingdom upon which thought was centred. St. Paul, whose was the dominating mind among the Apostles, dwells continually on this feature. It was not the here, but the hereafter which concerned them. The birth of the Saviour was but the opening of the door to the arena wherein his work was to be accomplished, but an insignificant though necessary detail without which the redemption of mankind could not have been brought about. In a word, it was a humiliating circumstance best left unnoted.

For this maid is MURINE wise."

MONTEREY PAINTERS

BY ELLEN DWYER DONOVAN.

Robert I. Aitken's panel portrait of Charles J. Dickman.

Midway between Monterey and Pacific Grove is to be found the pretty home, recently built, of Mr. C. J. Dickman, the artist. It is situated in one of the most advantageous and delightful spots to be found in the Artist Colony of Monterey. It overlooks an expanse of wondrously changing scenery — due to local atmospheric conditions — of mountain and forest, sea and sky, rare to be found the world over.

As one enters the reception-room of the genial host, the artistic note given out of unaffected simplicity impresses the visitor. After descending a short flight of steps—to the left of the reception room as you enter—a fair idea of the artist's labor of the last twelve months can be gained by the many canvases hanging in his art gallery; paintings which have been added to his last year's collection. Prominent among them is a large canvas "Before the Storm." It is a replica of the one purchased by the Bohemian Club of San Francisco, for two thousand dollars. It is a spirited work—a craft dipping into a deep bed of sea, with mountain waves just ridden, and many more to ride. The seaman is aloft, regulating and manipulating his sails, and lending his encouraging touch to the struggling, gallant bark. The spirit of night is closing round, with its accompanying additional dangers. You feel the foamy spray. You inhale the ozone, and though the wave-washed deck is not visible in the darkening light, you are made to feel its discomforts. It is an absorbing and haunting picture.

Among the late additions to Mr. Dickman's gallery are many historic scenes; "La Casa de las quatros vientes," or House of the Four Winds, taken from the inner court, is probably one of the most interesting in the collection. It is a view never before taken of this old landmark of Mexican occupation, and gives one a fair idea of what the weather signal house was, before Sloat hoisted the stars and stripes over the old Custom House by the sea.

Mr. Dickman's Normandy and Brittany scenes are especially interesting; for one thing among others, the different life-notes they give us, as compared to our civilization. They are great studies in values and harmony of coloring, and in them one can see that the artist possesses that power over material, which proves no mean style.

Over the door, leading into the art gallery, is a bas-relief of the painter in his studio, herein given. It is the work of Mr. Robert Aitken, and a speaking likeness. It is true to the spirit of Mr. Aitken's best work, and bears the stamp of genius.

There is much that might be said of Mr. Dickman's ability, in other lines than painting, did space permit. For one thing, he possesses a rare baritone voice, and might easily have made his mark as a vocalist. He is at present engaged on a portrait of Mr. Frank Deering of this city.

Across the street from El Carmelo hotel, at the Grove, the studio of Professor Ivey is to be found. The first impression that one receives on entering is that of color. California is well represented on those walls, and proves the professor to be a close student of the atmospheric conditions which produce brilliant effects.

Monterey Bay is a transcript of that portion of the bay which, when seen from the heights above the town, is always compared to the Bay of Naples. Its composition appears to be as perfect as a pictorial composition can be. Its scheme of color is that which is seen under broken clouds. In the foreground there is a mass of olive-toned oaks, with the sun-lighted fields on the right, which stretches away to the near curve of the bay; and again carries those foam-fringed curves past the sands of Del Monte, while again over the turquoise limpidity of its waters is seen the picturesque mountains in the distance.

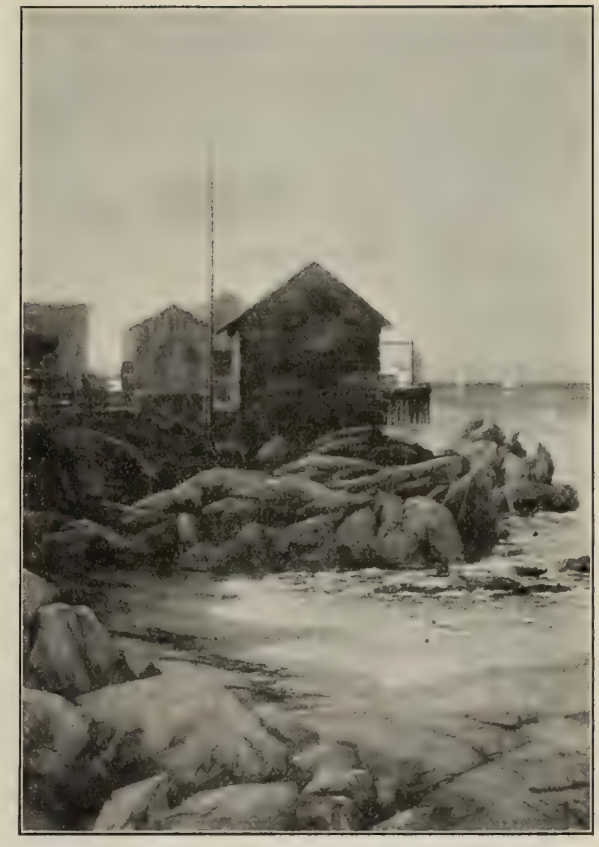
"Lorna Doone" land—whether it is that the artist has made this district his favorite sketching ground or no, it is certain that the few examples of these illustrations of this bewitching book, "Lorna Doone" are second to nothing in his present portfolio. Those pictures are full of that dreamy poetic feeling which Blackmore wove so wonderfully into his story. In one the morning mists are being scattered into tender visions, while the soft rolling landscape lies glittering in pearly dew-drops, and leads the eye out into the great Valley of the Exe.



"The Old Wharf," by Mr. Ivey, will readily be recognized by any visitor to the old Mexican town.

Mr. Arthur Mathews has of late given his time to mural decorations for private homes. Some of the panels have been photographed for reproduction; barcaroles, fantasies, etc., but the delicate tints of grays and pinks did not take sufficiently well to warrant reproduction here, hence a loss to the interested public.

Little need be said to the San Francisco public regarding Mr. Mathews' work. His reputation has long since been established. He is at present engaged on a frieze for the Mechanics' Institute. The decorations done on the Dingee and Taussig residences are works of art, which this city may well be proud of. In omitting to give any measure of value to Mr. Mathews' line of work, it must be understood as the highest compliment the writer can pay to the skill and ability of the man.

Mr. Francis McComas' exhibition at Vickery's this year proves to the public the marked maturity which the young painter has gained in the last few years, in achieving art. The many pictures which he has sold in the last twelve months speak the confidence the art lovers entertain of his ability. Twelve were sold at the November exhibition of last year, and seven so far this year, though the term of Exhibition is not more than half expired. Several have also been sold from his studio, making about thirty in number all told within the last twelve months.

Visitors to this exhibition voice their sentiments of conviction that it will only be a matter of a short time before Mr. McComas will be recognized as a leading water-color artist. There is something so seductively fascinating in his coloring that it takes study and repeated visits to be able to grasp its fullest meaning.

"Summer—Monterey" is one of the truest interpretations of the title that could be expressed of that dreamland of the south. The restful summer speaks from the sun-dried land, clothed in its brown tints; some light, some dark. They are the browns which the eastern painters cannot understand until they have made a visit to California.

The summer is there;—heat; the parched earth; the warm air; the drooping famished oaks, all making their plea for the friendly rains of fall to hasten. Summer speaks from every blade of withered grass; from every drooping leaf of the shade-giving cluster of giant oaks. There are a thousand mysterious messages sent out to us from this painting, which are untranslatable on paper. Things "which we can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal."

"Cypress Land" brings to us, who have had the pleasure of seeing it, the recollection of the beautiful driveway, along the rocky, surf-beaten coast, with the sea and sky of wondrous coloring, and off to the point in the distance the attention is called to the ostrich-shaped cypress, boldly outlined, against the blue of the summer sky.

The spirit of Monterey cannot readily be thrown off after a visit to this exhibition at Vickery's.

Mr. McComas' studio is centrally situated in the old town of Monterey, at La Senorita Bonifacios. Gertrude Atherton has made this house famous by her story of "The Wash-tub Mail." The Sherman rose blooms as fair today, along the trellis-work overhead in the front garden, as if the withering hand of time had not laid low the one for whom it was named—the hero of the tale; or if it had never shared in a romance, which was fated to bruise the heart of the gentle-faced heroine.

"Do not fail to see Miss Mary Brady," came over the phone to me from a Monterey artist.

"An artist?" I questioned.

"Yes, one of the ablest women in the colony."

"Why have I not heard of her before?"

"'Tis a case of genius and extreme modesty."

On the road to Miss Brady's I met a high priest of the cult.

"I am going to see Miss Brady," I said, "I understand she is one of your clever women."

"No, she is not clever," he returned, looking off into space, his face as expressionless as a sphinx.

"I have been led to believe so," I argued tentatively.

"You were misled," he returned seriously. Then with some show of energy, she added, "No, she lacks the elements of artificiality which go to make up cleverness. Miss Brady is an able woman, of rare modest tendencies."

"In what line does she show strength in her work?"

"In any line she chooses. She works in no groove. She is too broad for that. Figure painting or landscape; it makes but little difference. Were she more self-assertive, she would be talked about."

A short interval in Miss Brady's presence, in her studio, convinced me of the truth of "genius and modesty." It might be called timidity. Closer acquaintance revealed a woman of nobly moulded character, of fine mental fibre and a painter.

Some of the finest Monterey sand-dunes to be seen are from the brush of this artist. The study in still life here given cannot fail to attract special notice for arrangement, drawing and color. The fingers itch to pluck the feathers off the breast of the goose, they are so real. The sketch of a Chinaman, also given from a finished painting, is considered one of the best things done of its kind. Miss Brady spent five years studying abroad. The first years were spent at the Julian Academy in Paris.

It is to be regretted that illness in the family for the last year has left Miss Eveline McCormack little time to devote to her studio work. "The Old Whaling Station Monterey" is, however, on her easel, waiting for additional shadows, and finishing touches generally.

Miss McCormack knows well what is wanted, and her paintings prove ability. Some of the best Monterey scenes have been done by her. Miss McCormack and Miss Brady work a good deal on the same lines. Both women studied at the Julian Academy, under Boulanger le Fevre and Constans. It was Miss McCormack and Miss Brady who found Monterey for the artists, proving thereby their true artistic note.

Mrs. Lucia K. Mathews, wife of Mr. Arthur Mathews, the painter, has supplied us with two charming sketches of finished paintings, recently seen at the exhibition at the Maple room of the Palace Hotel. They were taken on the land near the Tevis residence, Monterey.

No local woman artist is considered more able than Mrs. Mathews. The harmonious blending of color noticeable in Mr. McComas' paintings, is also traceable in those of Mrs. Mathews. In making that remark to a sister artist, she said: "Yes, that remark was made to Mrs. Mathews, before she saw a painting of Mr. McComas." Both possess to a striking degree the same restful, subtle touch of the keys, and prove a kindred vein of genius. Such color affects us like beautiful strains of music, woven into our spirit from the touch of a master hand. It is not the color which might dazzle the uninitiated, rather otherwise. It is the color which proves the true effort to art.

The paintings of Mrs. Mathews and Miss Brady are in line with those of Mr. McComas. They are marked by a unity of color, design, and an underlying constructiveness as a motive in drawing that give a solidarity to a canvas, almost wholly absent in modern painting as a bulk. In body, or even scattered through an exhibition, pictures of their class carry the stamp that leads the public and others to mouth the word "Whistlerism." Whistlerism or no, it differs little, but one would be nearer the truth, if it were said "this is the art," or at least, the true effort at gaining it.

Color, not colors; construction, not patchwork; drawing, not fumbling, leads to but one goal.

In Mrs. Mathews' studio are some fine things in the way of figure painting—"A Monterey Oak," also, which deserves special notice, but space does not permit it here. There is no straining after effect in it, but the oak tree is there. The summer browns prevail, and the heat-laden atmosphere is present. It is probably one of the finest things to be found in Mrs. Mathews' portfolio.

A Corner of Monterey Bay.
By John Ivey.

Mr. Charles Rollo Peters was found in his cosy home, on the hillside, among the pines. While we sat around the broad hearth fire of his restful reception room, he talked of art and artists, of the present and the past. He spoke of the merits of Velasquez, as compared to Murillo; he talked of Titian, Romney, of Reynolds, of Boulanger, and of Gerome, and while he handled his matter in a scholarly way, the listener's eye became restless to secure the note of unity of purpose and harmony of arrangements, which made up the ensemble of this well appointed room, and the adjoining pretty den. This is of all things the home of an artist.

The art gallery, contiguous to Mr. Peters' home, is shorn of its fine paintings. They are packed to be sent to London, where the artist intends living for the next five years; though at the time of this interview, he was doubtful of the advisability of exposing his young family to the rigors of travel for the winter months. It is more than probable that he will wait for the genial days of spring, before undertaking such a journey with his responsibilities.

Mr. Peters' nocturnes in blue, embracing Monterey scenes and historic land marks, need but little notice from our pen. "Colton Hall" is one of the finest. This building is a relic of the days when a "gringo" alcalde occupied the chair made vacant by the deposed Mexican power. It brings back to us the history of the Picos; of the gallant Sutter; of Fremont and General Kearny, of Gillespie's battalions and Moor's dragoons; of the battles fought between the Aztec Eagle and the Stars and Stripes. It brings us back to the days when pride-broken senoras hurriedly threw their rebosas around their handsome heads to tell the news of the defeat of the "Californians" in the South to the nearest neighbor; when tearful senoras and weeping senoritas watched the hoisting of the American flag over the Custom House, by the order of Commodore Sloat; of the time which, no matter how advantageous to his country, Thomas O. Larkin was made to feel the loss of a Consulship which must of necessity have proved a satisfactory berth to the well bred and intelligent "Bandelero."

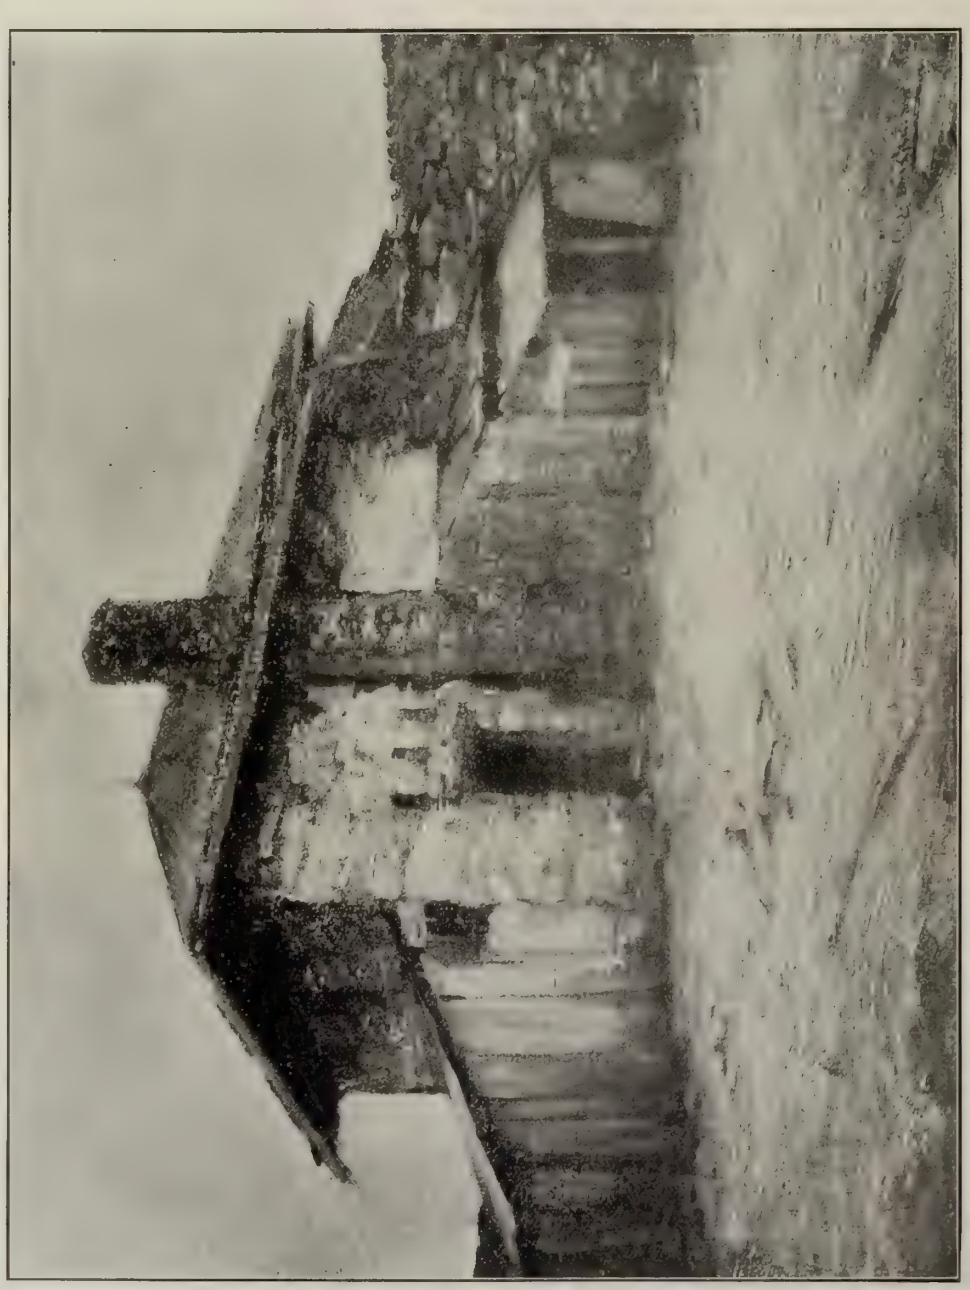
"Before the Gringoes Came," another striking painting of Mr. Peters, makes a mute appeal to us from the past, from a civilization almost entirely wiped out—a gallant and generous civilization which was not controlled by grasping, sordid motives of life. This crumbling adobe, with its sunken tiles, is picturesque and pathetic in its decay, and the lone tree leaning in silent converse beside it tells its tale of sympathy.

"Moonlight," given here, is one of the most beautiful things of its kind, for drawing, color and values. Nothing could be finer.

Mr. Peters is a great admirer of the English painters of the present day. He says they are far in advance of the French school, with the exception of Boulanger and Gerome. Other master workmen in his craft voice different sentiments, however.



Mr. Mathews says there is no such thing as the French school of painting, a Dutch, or an English school, etc., nor has there ever been any except the Academic school, which began with the renaissance, or about the year 1499, and ended about 1850, when the little colony of painters at Barbazon received recognition from the Academy, after a long-made fight. The "Goths" triumphed in their new and rugged field. Their canvases spoke the life of the "Man with the Hoe," as opposed by the classical pursued by the academy. Millet, Corot, Diez, Rousseau, etc., were of the colony. It was a complete breaking away from the academy, which worked to perpetuate the old Greek school of art, which came down to us from the days of the rule of Pericles, days which produced a Zeuxis, a Parrhasius, an Apelles, an Agatharchas; a time when Phidias wrought his gold and ivory into heroic figures of Zeus; a Minerva, and placed them in the pillared temples of the classic land of Helles.

The Black Bracelet

BY HARRY COWELL.

"Who is that man over there with the other-world face?"

Thus an old young woman.

"What man?—Which other world? There are two of them."

Thus a young old one.

"There is but one man in the room, and he has both the other worlds in his face. He is not of this earth—nor for it long, I fear."

"Don't be sentimental, my dear: I'm a woman. Only one man in the room! I do wish all the Muse-loving males present might hear you. Your one man, however, is not a man at all."

"Then he's the 'beyondman' of Nietzsche. Pain has spiritualized his limbs, to borrow of poor Heine. His beauty is unearthly, though. He looks like a god. I am afraid of him. You were right to say he is not a man at all. What made you say that? Why is he not a man?"

"Because he's a lion."

"How can you jest? I feel as I did that day at Oberammergau. I want to stoop down and take the shoes from off my feet."

"So should I, dear, if I wore number two's."

"Don't. We are in the presence of the only sacred thing left to us—a sublime sorrow—or my eyes were not made to see with. Gethsemane is no place for jokes. Who—what—is he?"

"He's a lion, I tell you—a king of beasts, who makes our men folk look like mice and who shuns us women like a girdled friar. See him padding back and forth, back and forth, ignoring the gaping crowd, his burning eyes on the door, ever bent on escape."

"His eyes were on the door—yes. But a door may let a lioness in as well as let a lion out."

"You have it. Your eyes were made to see with. I had always thought they were made to be seen. I've been wondering all the evening how ever in the world our dear hostess managed to get a real live lion in here to be looked at.—he won't be talked at—that's plain to be seen—and you've said it, child. She used the love lure. Your lions will follow it as a kitten follows fish. Ah, ha! Our friar's in a fair way of being unfrocked, it seems. You should have seen her going round, gushing—that was before you came in—'Of course you've met my friend, Mr. Paul Crosby, the poet? No! I'm astonished! Well, I must introduce you, then.' She'd never set eyes on the man herself until this blessed evening. I know that for a fact."

"So God made him a poet, a little higher than the angels—I knew he was an 'overman.' . . . Paul Crosby! I never heard of him, though."

"No wonder. Your 'overman' is as obstinate as a mule. He can write poetry, but he won't. Now the man who can write and won't write ought to be made write; and the woman who can't write and will write ought to be——"

"Why woman?"

"Why, in order to bring in both sexes. I don't believe in making invidious distinctions."

"But if he doesn't write poetry, how can he be a poet?"

"Quite a little philosopher, I see. You're twice too pretty for that. However, he has written a whole volume of it—which was printed privately for half a dozen friends. It is impossible to get a copy. A noted critic says he's the greatest lyric-maker alive—not even excepting Swinburne. Of course, that's nothing; critics don't count. But the magazine editors and the publishers follow him round the world on their knees. That's everything; he's a poet. But he won't publish. No one knows why. Just think of it! And they say his poetry has more love to a line and more sorrow to a stanza than anything ever written."

"Love and sorrow! What would art do without them? But who's getting sentimental now, I'd like to know?"

"Not I. I said, 'they say.' They say, too, that he actually gave a copy of his poems to that little Rosalind Latouche. Of course I don't believe it—that little thing! She's pretty enough—nothing but a nurse, though. You never met her, did you? She doesn't go anywhere."

"A nurse, did you say? N-no, I never met her."

"Oh, she's not quite a professional, though she might just as well be. She does nothing but stick all day—and all night for that matter—with that grumpy, gouty old 'daddy' of hers. It's a wonder they wouldn't hire some one; they must be quite well off: they keep a carriage. And Rosalind dresses like a dairymaid, too. It doesn't much matter, of course, for no one ever sees her. It's a shame, though, for people to be so stingy."

"How ever did you find out so much about them?"

"Why, Rosalind is Miss Manders' niece. She never comes here. Of course, she'd be altogether out of place among artists. Just fancy; Miss Manders told me this evening as a great secret that Rosalind gets lots of things for her father by writing under a nom de plume for the magazines! I don't believe a word of it, do you? If she were a writer, she'd come here quick enough, even if it did mean a dress and a nurse for the night. In her mother's time things were different, they say."

Everywhere throughout Miss Manders' dilletant drawing-rooms similar conversations were being carried on. The lion, as a wag remarked, was in everybody's mouth. Men and women crowded around him, with the manners of menagerie-goers. Persons who had once received a single subscription for twenty stanzas, or five dollars for a soap advertisement in verse, hastened to address Paul Crosby as fellow-craftsman, brother artist, kindred soul. Others, hearing that he was a poet, feigned familiarity with his work, though they had never seen a line of it. First-year art students desired to immortalize his face. Gushing young lady reporters saw a "story" in it, a chance to get some good "copy," and were eager to "write him up." It would be a good free "ad." for him, they assured him, and would make him famous. "Artist" photographers found him the best "subject" they had ever seen. Notes were made on cuffs and ivory fans; pencil sketches were drawn. Fifty unconscious caricatures, of twenty-five varieties, were conceived. Dreams of dollars and incidental fame were indulged in.

But over the heads of them all, Paul Crosby, the poet, restlessly crossing and re-crossing the room, kept watching the door.

This continued for over an hour. Then the poet sought out his hostess, bowed low, and without waiting to hear the expostulations addressed to him, made his way through the throng. Before he reached the door, however, it was opened, and the poet and one of the Master's poems met face to face.

"I was going. I despaired of your coming," said the poet.

"Who would have dreamed of meeting you here?" said the poem.

"You invited me."

"Yes, but——"

Miss Manders came forward.

"I'm late, Auntie. Daddy would have me come. He swore he wouldn't miss me one bit, the old dear. A downright lie, they say, means a hundred years in purgatory.——"

"A hundred years less for that one," interposed Paul Crosby.

"Oh, Rosalind, do help me to persuade Mr. Crosby to stay awhile." Thus the hostess.

"Will you?" pleaded the girl.

"I will," acquiesced the man.

Miss Manders retired.

"I am stifling," breathed the poet; "let us take a turn in the garden."

As they passed through the outer door, a gracious moonlight met them with a smile, as though it had been waiting for them. This welcome on the part of their new hostess seemed to put them at once at their ease. They fell into step, walking in silence, with a slow, rhythmic movement as if to soft music: the two bodies seemed to have but one soul. The poet was the first to speak:—

"I was at the last gasp," said he, "when you came in, bringing with you a breath of God's out-of-doors. How altogether out of place you were in that room—like a leaf of Burns bound up by mistake in a volume of Pope. By the way, have you read me?"

"Over and over again."

"And what do you think of—of them?"

"I could not think at all—only feel."

"How did you feel?"

"At home, but sad.

"Why sad?"

"I know not. I am never merry when I read great poetry. The sublime saddens me. Beauty is born of tears and sacred sweat; and is best seen through tears. I wonder if the birth of Venus from the waves was not meant to symbolize that fact."

"A sea of tears and sweat—the sweat of men, the tears of women—that is the Atlantic of hyperbole!"

"And offends you, I fear. Genius alone knows how to be simple."

"And goodness how to be sweet."

At the word genius the man had backed away as from a blow struck at him; but the girl, whose eyes were lowered as she spoke, did not see his action. However, the pain in his voice as he returned her spoken caress caused her to look up.

The heaven had gone out of his face.

"Ah, I know I have offended you. You think me like the others."

"Indeed I do not—like no other. I am not offended. Come, let us sit down here under this willow."

There enshrined, they sat in silence—a silence that was like music in the mind of the composer—and that which cannot be uttered passed between them. From time to time the girl looked at Paul's face and saw in the half-light, with ecstasy but withal a sweet fear, the over-brightness of a poet's brow haloed with happiness. Some white magic—was it that of the moonlight?—had exorcised the evil spirit that for a moment had taken possession of him.

But the poet, lord of words, was speechless.

The girl arose, coy fear compelling her feet.

The man arose, too, facing her, and held out his arms in mute appeal. His silence won her completely. She understood it. And yet, a maidenly reserve, a desire to have the conventions half-satisfied, caused her to wait for a word.

Paul did not speak it. Instead he stretched out his arms a little farther.

Her eyes met his, and the old, old encounter of man and maid was on once more. The heavens seemed interested in the issue: the moon and the stars stood at gaze. Suddenly some arch-traitor in the woman's camp hauled down the colors of coyness and ran up his own in their stead. Now, unless a greater than he intervene, the victory is to the man.

It is not. Fate, whom even Love fears, does intervene.

As the traitor ran up his flag, the woman lowered her eyes. Her glance fell on a black bracelet which the receding of the cuff exposed to view on the man's right forearm.

She recoiled, her gaze still fixed on the thing.

A superstitious terror fastened its fangs in her throat. A shiver such as peasants say is caused by somebody walking over the place where one's grave is to be shook her as the branches of the willow overhead were being shaken by a sudden icy wind.

Paul Crosby's glance had followed hers. His arms fell to his side like lowered semaphores. In his face the fire died away, and for a moment a great darkness overshadowed it. Then where the fire had been—nothing but gray ashes.

"Come," said he, "you are cold; let us go in. We have stayed out too long." And he offered her his arm.

She tried to take it, but could not. That black thing would be just above her hand!

As he parted the willow branches to let her through, a bit of tender green broken off by his hands fell on her head and fastened itself in her hair. She tore it out as though it had been a tarantula and was about to throw it down when she checked herself, saying: "No, I will wear it." And she put it into her bosom.

Then the cruel fingers of jealousy closed over her young heart which fluttered like a wounded dove in the hands of a hunter.

No wonder he had been silent! He was not free to love her. That awful band bound him to another—surely some hideous hag! Who else would bestow so terrible a love token? . . . Still he loved her. She was sure of that—as she had been from the first. . . . But even now, she would fain hear it from his lips. . . . How close she had come to yielding to the entreaty of those outstretched arms!

In silence—spoiled music now—they made their way towards the house. From time to time weird black clouds veiled the face of the moon. A cold wind had sprung up; and dark shadows of shaken branches danced like witches on the lawn. The woman shuddered and instinctively drew near the man. Then she remembered, and recoiled. She fell back a step or two and rejoined him on the other side.

"Mr. Crosby," she said abruptly—both had hitherto unconsciously refrained from using any names in addressing each other—"Mr. Crosby, poets show great delicacy in the use of words—define duty for me."

"Duty," he repeated; "I know how to do it, Miss Latouche; that is the best — the only — definition in my power."

They paused. For a moment the moon shone out again unshaded, transfiguring the face of the woman, which now resembled that of the Mother of Sorrows. With an adorable movement, she took the man's right hand and raised it to her lips. "On the right hand of Duty," she breathed, "I place my first kiss." And she fled before him into the house.

They entered the garish room together, her hand on his arm. There was a lull in the breezy talk. Then for the second time the poet bowed his adieux. His hostess now made no expostulations.

The breeze freshened again:—

"Well, we're a pretty pair of fools, to be sure; he has merely been doing the polite to his hostess' niece."

"To the end of a cigar."

"Wrong, my dear; look at his face—there is no doubt now to which other world it belongs."

The speakers laughed. The poet had not been presented to the younger. The elder he had ignored.

Then Rosalind remembered her father. For the first time since he had been consigned to her care at the hands of her dying mother had she completely forgotten him. And she hurried out on the heels of the poet under fire of the significant glances of Miss Manders' guests.

The next day Rosalind received the following letter:

"Beloved:

"I will not say to you: Forgive me; forget me; marry another; be happy. You, I know will find nothing to forgive; you will not forget me; you will not marry another; you will not be happy. I love you. You love me. You are the woman for whom I have waited; I the man for whom you have waited. We both knew that at the first glance when what our ignorance calls Chance brought us—two recluses— face to face. We were silent together: the voice of the soul is very low. In that silence all was said. What need of words? But between us stands Fate—Fate in her most frightful aspect. There is for us no joy but that of sharing sorrow. You saw my black bracelet. You felt that I was not free. You were jealous. With reason, and yet without reason. All my life have I loved Love, loved Woman, but never a woman except you. But a beautiless dame without mercy has me in thrall. Hear my story:—

"My parents—they were first cousins—died during my childhood. I was brought up with the son of my guardian. We were rivals in the games of boys. He disliked me because I defeated him. Many a time have I wished that he might win, but I held it a lie not to do my best. But he did not hate me until we became (apparently) rivals in love. We were both sixteen, I a few months younger than he, when a sweet girl of twenty came to visit at our home. He loved her. I did not. Still she preferred me. He asked her to marry him. I fancy she must have smiled as she said No. When I met him, he was furious. 'What is the matter?' I asked. 'Matter!' he yelled. 'She has refused me. But you'll never marry her —or any one else either—unless you're already too crazy to have the least bit of manhood left in you. Both your father and mother died mad as March hares!'

"Since then I have worn my black bracelet as a perpetual reminder that love—that marriage— is not for me. For his brutal words were only too true. Hereditary insanity was in the family. With me ends the race of Crosby. Yes, the hag, whose badge I wear, who awaits me as my bride, whose husband I must soon become, is—Madness.

"You will now understand my avoidance of women, the passion in my poetry—and why it made you sad. You will no longer wonder why the mention of genius makes me shudder; why fame is to me as sounding brass and as tinkling cymbal. Perhaps because I knew it to be impossible, I have longed for love, lived for love, as never man before. And save for your kiss upon my hand I have never known the least of its sweets—nor ever shall. I have wept to see a peasant pass through his cottage door at evening. But enough. You will understand all.

"Beloved, it is best not to see you again. When near you, a prompting that seems the very voice of God himself, yet cannot be, tempts me to defy the Fate. Heredity; to fling my black bracelet into the fire; to do Love's bidding. Yes, Passion is the prince of sophists. It argues that I, my head barely above water in a sea of sorrows (you mind your hyperbole?), am yet glad that I was born. Then I study my tottering reason. I spell over those four divine letters, D-U-T-Y, and try to forget four others still more divine.

"Enclosed is a letter. It is from my mother to you. My guardian gave it to me the day I came of age. On the outside is the written request not to open it until my twenty-fifth birthday; and not to marry until I shall have read it. I shall never read it. More than once, especially since I met you, I have been strangely tempted to do so. At this moment the temptation is almost irresistible. The significance of this weakening of the will is very obvious to me. However it is still strong enough to guard sacredly a mother's last request. Moreover, do I not already know its contents? I was born just after the stroke of midnight on the morning of the thirteenth of December, 187—. On the thirteenth of next December, will you, my sane self, read it for me. To-morrow I place myself in charge of my friend, Dr. R——, the alienist, whose works on that subject, as well as many others, I know by heart.

"Farewell. If I wake up my right self in another world, I will await you there.

"Paul Crosby."

The voice of Duty calling her down-stairs saved the reason of Rosalind Latouche.

* * * * * * *

It was near midnight of the twelfth of December. "Daddy" Latouche was fast asleep. Rosalind was in her bedroom, watching the clock, a sealed letter clasped in her thin, trembling hands. Paul in his room in Dr. R——'s private asylum, though awake, was unaware of the fact that in a few moments he would be twenty-five years old.

At the first stroke of the clock, Rosalind started and grew paler than the world without, which was in its winding-sheet. At the last she was calm. What more had she to fear from Fate? The hands that broke the twenty-year old seal were strangely steady. She read:—

"My darling Boy Paul:

"You are not my son. I never had a child. Perhaps it is best so—God only knows. You were born of a beautiful wild love which the Church could not bless. The story is not new. Your father was of the people. He had brains and beauty. Your mother had blood and beauty. Both he and she were poor. Your grandmother bribed her maid to filch herself of her own good name and that of your father at the same time. Then she sold your mother to a rich merchant, to save the honor of a roue son and to prevent her headstrong daughter from contracting a misalliance. On the evening of the wedding-day, the maid, who loved your father and was jealous of your mother, confessed the perfidy. Your mother divorced herself on the spot. But the law was not of her mind. Then your parents decided to live above the law. But after a lifetime crowded into less than a year, your father died (I will tell you the truth—I alone know it) of—innutrition. Two weeks after, in my barren bed, your mother died of—you. She was my friend. I love you as if you were my very own flesh, as everybody believes you to be. You are already a brave boy. When you read this, you will be yet a braver man, unafraid to look the world in the face. Your parents' sin (if sin it must be called) has been fully expiated. God will surely not visit it upon you. Into His keeping I commend my darling—my son after the spirit.

"Your loving 'mother,'

"Helen Crosby."

"P. S.—Keep the name of Crosby—for my sake. Your mother did not wish you to know her name or that of your father. I know not why; for to the end she gloried in what the world called her shame. 'When he is old enough to understand, tell him the story of our love; but do not tell him our names.' These were her last words."

In the face of Rosalind Latouche, after she had made an end of reading, the upper and the lower other worlds were alternately reflected—now there was all the ecstasy of the one, and now all the despair of the other—as aforetime in the face of her lover. She sank on her knees beside the bed and prayed:

"O Merciful Father, give—quickly—thy—beloved—sleep."

The Ghost of Felton Lodge

BY THEODORE T. BONNET.

It was a raw and gusty night, and the rain pelted Felton Lodge as though it had a grievance against that frail, frame structure, which creaked in all its joints while the winds of winter on their mournful trumpets blew.

The rest seeker from the metropolis who wanders into the Santa Cruz mountains in the summer season to enjoy the delicious climate and inspiring scenery, and who goes into ecstacies over the charms of nature as there unfolded, would be somewhat skeptical if told of the metamorphosis that is wrought when winter comes on. Storms occur in those redwood forests that are severe and destructive, and on this Christmas eve the guests gathered round the blazing fire-place in Felton Lodge were keenly sensible of the fact that the elements were raging. Tom Stevens, the host of Felton Lodge, was known to be delightfully unencumbered. He was a bachelor of forty and had inherited a large fortune from a thrifty father. He was a member of the Bohemian Club, in which he was extremely popular both on account of his generosity and his talent for projecting and carrying out successful jinks. He bought Felton Lodge some years before the opening of this story for no other purpose than to provide enjoyment for his friends. Though a bachelor, he loved the society of women, and nothing pleased him more than to have beneath his rooftree a select coterie of men and women of congenial temperament. He affected principally the society of the bohemian element, not the devotees of the old-fashioned Bohemia, with its atmosphere of unconventionality and its partiality for pipes, sawdust and beer, but of the refined Bohemia that comprehends a polite dilettanteism, and encourages a penchant for the creature comforts.

Felton Lodge would accommodate some twenty guests, and had done so in former times when its original owner was in possession. But since it was purchased by Tom Stevens its bedrooms had remained unoccupied from year's end to year's end, for Stevens maintained another country place—in Marin county—which was easier of access than his picturesque resort in the heart of the Santa Cruz mountains. It was only during the holiday season that he rounded up his friends for a visit to Felton Lodge, for he preferred the mountains in the depth of winter, when the streams were swollen and the tall redwoods bent to the breezes.

On this occasion there were only six people enjoying his hospitality. They had assembled after dinner in the spacious living room, the most enticing feature of which was the broad fire-place in which the redwood logs crackled and glowed in a way that riveted the gaze of those circled in front of it. In the group were Will Francis, the attorney, his young bride, a literary woman who wrote for the magazines; Miss May Toliffe, a society woman who had made a sensation by going on the stage, but who retired before winning laurels; Mr. Flickman, the artist, who sang comic songs; Miss Della Leroy, a society vocalist, whose friends thought that she would startle the country if she would go on the comic opera stage, and Mrs. Patton, the aunt of Miss Leroy, who was acting as chaperon for her niece.

Della Leroy was a young woman of beauty and culture. She was almost too intense to be comfortable, but she could charm and fascinate on occasions. There was a beauty in the gray iris of her eyes that held the attention of men.

On this occasion she was holding the attention of Flickman, who was feeling very gay. He couldn't tell you whether the entree at dinner was calf's head vinaigrette or vol-au-vent de riz de veau, and he didn't remember whether it was red or white wine he had been drinking, but whatever it was it had reached the right spot, and he was in the humor to admire Miss Leroy, especially after he had heard her sing.

He wanted to hold her hand, but she laughed at him, and Stevens frowned.

Flickman had the reputation of being a very fast young man, and for that reason women liked him. In the presence of her aunt Miss Leroy was discreet.

By way of diverting Flickman's attention from Miss Leroy, Stevens remarked that it was fine weather for the Yuletide season.

"Never talk about the weather," admonished Flickman with mock severity; "it's the refuge of those who are bored. Miss Leroy, if you don't sing another song Stevens will try to rush us off to bed."

"I should rather you'd tell a story," said Della.

"Not for me," exclaimed Stevens. "Flickman's repertoire is for club purposes only."

"Oh, for a ghost story!" exclaimed Mrs. Francis. "This is the night for tales of ghosts and hobgoblins."

"I love ghost stories and I dote on hobgoblins and fairies," said Della. "This weather puts one in the mood for listening to weird tales."

She looked at Stevens inquiringly and pleadingly, as though she felt that as the host it was his duty to supply the wants of his guests. It would be hard for him to resist an appeal from Miss Leroy's melting eyes, and there was a mild suspicion among some of Stevens's intimate friends that she had inspired him with more than a merely friendly regard.

"Well, if you like ghost stories," he said, "I should summon the housekeeper and ask her to tell you about the ghost of Felton Lodge."

"Trot out the ghost," said Flickman.

"Have you a disembodied spirit in your entourage?" asked Francis.

"So I've been told," replied Stevens.

Arising, he stood with his back to the fireplace, assuming the attitude into which men are prone to fall whenever they are near a blazing hearth. Men draw inspiration from a fireplace. With back to it they seem to derive moral support and become emboldened to maintain their opinions or to open up their more private thoughts.

"'Felton Lodge,' as you probably know," began Stevens, "derived its name from Roger Felton, an Englishman who came to these mountains for his health about fifteen year ago. He was accompanied by his wife, a very pretty French woman, whom he had met while studying art in Paris. She was a vivacious little woman with a past, and Felton was her devoted slave. They lived happily here for about two years, when one day the husband returned from a fishing trip to find that the mistress of his home had departed. She left a note explaining that she was tired of her lonely life in the mountains, and had gone away with a man who had won her affections. Felton was broken-hearted. The shock was a severe one, and he could not be comforted or reconciled to his loss. But he confided in a neighbor, expressing the firm belief that his wife would return. He said she knew how he loved her, and that she could not be so cruel as to leave him forever. Every day he went to the railroad station, expecting to see her alight from the train. He would return home disappointed and sad, but ever hopeful. At night he kept a lamp burning in the window of her room to serve as a beacon for her. At the end of a year he was a mental and physical wreck, and one day he was missed by the men at the railroad station. They felt that something had happened. They were right. Felton was found dead in his bedroom with a bullet-hole in his head. He had committed suicide."

Stevens paused in his narrative and Miss Leroy shuddered.

"And now I suppose the Felton ghost haunts Felton Lodge," suggested Flickman, with a cynical air.

"So they say," was the reply, and Stevens smiled. "I have never seen the ghost, but people living near say they have. It is a tradition in this vicinity that the Englishman visits his wife's bedroom every night to greet her on her return."

It was nearly one o'clock Christmas morning when the guests of Felton Lodge dispersed to their rooms. Della Leroy had been deeply affected by the story of the Felton tragedy, and when she found herself alone in her room her spirits were depressed. She reflected on the loyalty of poor Felton and experienced a keen sense of pity. She never gave the ghost a thought until she had extinguished the light and nestled her head in the pillow. The storm had abated somewhat, though it was still blowing, but the moon had come out, and her room was dimly lighted by its pale beams. Presently Miss Leroy found herself speculating as to whether she was occupying the apartment that was formerly the bedroom of the faithless wife. She reflected somewhat stoically that if it was the room it was here that Felton came to await the coming of his wife. She was inclined to be amused at her own musings, but just then the branches of a tree that stood near the window were blown against it, and she was startled. At that moment her nerves became unstrung. Presently the branches again swept the window, and she at once comprehended the cause of her alarm, but she could not quite regain her courage. Weird fancies insisted upon intruding, and she could not repress the shudders that shook her frame.

Fully two hours passed before she attained what approximated normal composure, and then she resolved to close her eyes and sleep. She was completely exhausted, and gentle slumber at length soothed her, but suddenly she was awakened with a shock.

The creaking of a door had aroused her. The moon no longer illuminated the room, but looming before her startled vision in the darkness was a sinuous wavering figure garbed in white. She tried to scream, but uttered not the faintest sound. The figure approached her bed. She put her hands before her eyes, but she could see through her palms, as the awful thing drew near. She knew she was awake and that she beheld a spectre, for it paused at the foot of her bed,, raised its claw-like hands, drew the coverlet off and departed. Her blood was frozen in her veins and the fright caused her to sink into unconsciousness.

It was fully half an hour before she came to her senses, and she had scarcely opened her eyes when she saw the same horrible spectre again approaching her bed. Once more the claw-like hands reached toward her, and she thought she felt them on her throat.

Summoning all her strength, she uttered a piercing scream, and once more became unconscious.

There had been a lull in the storm, and presently a commotion was heard in the hall. The door was opened by the housekeeper, who held a lamp in her hand that threw a flood of light into the room. Behind were Tom Stevens and Mr. Francis.

As they entered the room they beheld a scene such as might occur in a problem play. Standing in his nightrobe near the bed, from which all the covers, with the exception of a sheet, had been drawn, was Tom Flickman.

There was an expression of mingled amazement and dread on his face.

On the bed lay Della Leroy. Her face wore an ashen hue. She looked as though she had fallen into the sleep that knows no awakening.

"What does this mean?" demanded Stevens.

"Looks pretty bad, doesn't it?" was all Flickman could say, and he dropped into a chair.

"Have you no explanation to make?" asked Stevens.

"Not now," was the reply. And then pointing to the bed he exclaimed, "I think she has fainted. For God's sake do something to revive her."

The housekeeper procured a basin of cold water and sprinkled the face of the unconscious woman. When she showed signs of reviving the men withdrew and then Flickman told his story.

He said that during the early morning he became very cold and decided to procure extra bed clothing. Knowing that there were many unoccupied rooms in the house, and not having heard anyone in the apartment adjoining his own, he knocked lightly on the door that separated them. Receiving no response, he opened the door and entered. He groped his way to the bed, pulled off the top cover and returned to his room. Presently he again felt cold and went back for a blanket. This time he was startled by a scream that almost, he confessed, scared him to death.

When Della Leroy appeared at breakfast that morning one lock of her black pompadour was white as snow.

MARIATTA

Reproduced for Town Talk from the only copy in this country of Edelfelt's great painting of the Madonna.

Mariatta the Virgin Mother

A Pagan Pre-Vision. This legend is an adaptation made by Anna Cox Stephens for Town Talk from the national epic poem of Finland, "The Kawala," which Max Muller ranks as the fifth great epic of the world.

Ages and ages ago the Golden Moon and the Silver Sun were stolen from the starred space by the wicked Louhi of Poyola. Cold and dark fell upon the Northland. The mountains, like the wraiths of primal things, and the islands lay bared and bosomed on the silenced waters. The people were stricken by despair until the ancient wisdom-singer and great magician Wainamoinen arose in his olden hero-might and smote the hosts of the Evil One of Poyola and brought back the Golden Moon and the Silver Sun. Thus his sword flashed forth new hope. All things rejoiced, and even the star flowers of snow bloomed violet-hearted in their inner petals, a prescience to the world of a mystery, a sigh of the heavenly Ukko and the symbol to man of peace and good will.

* * * * * * *

In that Northland of Suomi, nigh unto the mountains and closer to the Sara waters, there dwelt the maiden Mariatta in the safety of her father's shelter. She was his child of beauty and the spell of her loveliness was about and around her

"Golden ringlets, silver girdles Glittering upon her bosom."

Delight of her father, solace of her mother, the maiden knew only simple life since her birth.

* * * * * * *

Lovely was the young Mariatta when awakening to the rose-light of dawn, and as oft she was lured to the groved pine trees of the white-flowered forest. Far, far she wandered, and, wandering, she came to feel within her the stir of something strange and passionate and tremulous, always seeking, seeking. The imminent wonder of life was upon her, and, disturbed by the unrest, she lifted its unconsecrate desire unto mighty Ukko. In the golden luminance of the eve-watching Moon, she knew herself fathered above the bounden ties of things mortal—it was her re-birth into the Supreme.

* * * * * * *

In all the days she sought the flowered forest, and face to face with the young Springtime she gathered bud and blossom to her breast, their fragrance rapturing the pulses of her being, and the blooms were to her soul radiances of sweet secrets; in the unfolding of the crimson leaves she felt the revelation of the unutterable. In all the days the maiden found that the encircling silence of the forest was all in all to her, and her voice broke forth in hymnals that sung themselves in the olden runic way, and the earth grew very fair to the maiden Mariatta.

* * * * * * *

In all the days there was one morn when the white flowers transmuted to gold and the fretted rime of hoar frost was tinseled to beatific tinting. There arose of a sudden before her in the forest path a Mountain Berry aflaunt with the flame colors of the gods, and, flinging himself against her vestal fright flooded her lips with broken scarlet. All unknown to the Virgin, the Mountain Berry was the semblanced form of Love's visitation, love dominant for love's own sacrifice, and the maiden fell immolate of self to the higher self, the super-soul that was claimed by its own.

* * * * * * *

No voice was there in the pine trees. Secret was the white-flowered forest.

* * * * * * *

In all the days Mariatta, the maiden, sang strange strains to herself that gave no meaning, but that meant everything, and in the templed dark something strange trembled her heart strings, and from afar the voice of the lonely Mountain Berry called unto the lonelier maiden, "Come and take me to thy bosom."

* * * * * * *

In all the days Mariatta felt that the spirit of visioned love had outshadowed her. Child-joys fled like swift flitting dawn-birds, and a sweet trouble gripped her tender soul. The long hours she brooded under the graying wings of the unknown, and in the narrows of time her heart beat out the crowding moments, until, hard-pressed, she fell pleading at her mother's feet, to find that doubt had stopped the mother-heart. So she carried the bodies of her fears like living things to the arms of her father, and he, grim and stern, bade her from him. And unto him she cried out:

"Oh, my father, full of pity,
Source of all my good and evil,
Build for me a place befitting
Where my troubles may be lessened
And my heavy burdens lightened."

But her father banished her as an evil child of Hisi, and the maiden Mariatta turned from the wronging voice and, with Pitti, her faithful hand-maiden, Mariatta went forth on her troubled way.

* * * * * * *

In all the days she sought refuge over the desolated earth, and the way of rest was banished from the land, and the anguished heart cried out:

"I am not a child of Hisi;
I am not a bride unworthy;
Am not wedded to dishonor.
I shall bear a noble hero.
I shall bear a son immortal,
Who will rule among the mighty."

Seeking succor, and begging the Sara waters to relieve her, she was bidden to seek shelter of Ruotus. At every step the mountains trembled and the hilltops tottered, and the wizard Ruotus bade her farther onward to the stable of the steeds of Hisi, where they neighed unto the mountain-top of Tapio a welcome to the hapless Mariatta, who fell suppliant to mighty Ukko, crying out:

"Come to me and bring protection
To thy child—the Virgin Mother
To the maiden Mariatta—
In this hour of sore affliction
Come to me benignant Ukko.
Come, then, only hope and refuge,
Lest thy guiltless child should perish."

She entered the stable wherein were the steeds of Hisi, and thus she appealed:

"Let this pure and hapless Maiden
Find a refuge in thy manger."

And again the steeds neighed a welcome on the frost air, and their warm breath was pleasant as the vapor of a summer sea, and when Night listened and bird and beast heard the heavenly Song of Triumph, all things pulsed with a new joy in the stable of the steeds of Hisi:

"There the babe was born and cradled,
Cradled in a woodland manger
Of the Virgin Mariatta.
Pure as pearly dews of morning,
Holy as the stars in heaven.
There the mother rocks her infant
In his swaddling clothes she wraps him,
Lays him in her robes of linen,
Carefully the babe she nurtures, well she Guards her well-beloved, her golden
Child of beauty."

* * * * * * *

In all the days grief was falling heavy on the Virgin Mariatta. The Sun paled away and the Silver Moon faded from the heavens, for the Child had vanished and his loss stilled the hope and joy of her heart.

In all the days wandered the wretched Maiden Mother, searching, searching ever. When, lo! a Star came out of the spaces to meet her. Unto it she cried out:

"Oh, thou guiding star of Northland,
Dost thou know and will'st thou tell me
Where my darling Child has wandered
Where my holy Babe lies hidden?"

But the Star spake thus after the manner of mortals: "It was thy Child set me here to ever watch the even-tide and in the dark I shine eternal."

On and on wandered the Virgin, and the Golden Moon came out to meet her, and the maiden beseeched:

Golden Moon, by Ukko fashioned,
Hope and joy of Kalwala,
Dost thou know and wilt thou tell me
Where my holy Babe lies hidden?"

But the Golden Moon also spake to her after the manner of mortals, saying: "It was thy Child set me in eternal watch."

Then Mariatta spake unto the Silver Sun:

"Silver Sun, by Ukko fashioned,
Source of light and life in Northland,
Dost thou know and will'st thou tell me
Where my darling Child has wandered;
Where my golden Child lies hidden?"

And the Silver Sun spake unto her after the manner of the gods, saying:

"It was thy Child enthroned me King in the limitless heavens, and to me he gave the Golden Moon for wedding, and the stars forever are armied at my bidding, and the Night brings forever my cup of lethe-drink. Afar and yonder amidst kindly reeds and rushes lies thy holy Child asleeping."

And Mariatta, the Maiden Mother, hastens on joy-tipped feet to find her Child, and thenceforth in the land of Kalwala he grew in strength, and beauty and wisdom, and all the peoples wondered and adored, and called him Man of Sorrows.

The Christmas of the Crew

BY PAUL G. CLARK.

The sudden scream of her automobile in Central Park decided Violet on leaving New York. It had been the most frequent of the commonplace phenomena, it was the climax of itself; but it was also piled on the offense of other people's dogs, other people's horses, rigs, paint, powder, dresses, monacles, chiffon, silk-hats, balls, suppers, sermons, scandals, shippings, champagnes, debuts, exits, encores, and not least—the offense of other people themselves. Her nerves were keenly edged with educated niceties. It was the entire complexity of civilization that appalled, the good and bad,—that cosmic whole, a half of excellent evil, a half of high-bred nice. The world was a French clock, and there were too many seconds calling attention to the gilt, too many incidents for each hour. As her brain reviewed the spectacle that she called a day's business, she grew in turn amazed that the human machinery was great enough to accomplish such a range of action and indignant that it was little enough to tolerate it. There were ten men who consumed one hour; there was one man who consumed two hours; there were three women who took thirty minutes; there was a play that took five hours; there was a manager who demanded more, the ascendant necessities, eating, sleeping, parking in an automobile;—she was, in short, an actress.

To live—the problem for the first time puzzled her, she who was more than living and setting the very pace for life, a princess de la mode. To be happy,—that was the question for her whom pleasure had robbed of complaint, for her—towards whom the sphere of happiness was swirling always, a girl whose eyes inspired in the world the perpetual motions of servitude. But there was another side. She was in flame from being looked at, rays of attention pierced through her physique, fevering the physical and psychic system,—she was a model, a milliner of manners, the hack prompter of happiness, the drudge of every one's pleasure. The world was feasting off her vitality,—and that was what she called her day's work. It made three meals a day from her genius,—the genius of art and good looks and good-nature. Honors were the mask of the parasite. She enjoyed, but she was eating the baked viands and sweets of her own funeral feast. Deep horror of the splendid life, of the skeleton in gold chains, of the symphony saddening to a dirge, shocked her in an instant. So in an hour, leaving dogs and men, the man and the stage-manager, the women and the silk hats, powder and suppers, paint and the play, she slipped out of little, old, wonderful New York.

* * * * * * *

Where did she go?

* * * * * * *

As she went on her way to That Place she said: "I am a monomaniac." But it was contrary to the New Law to reflect.

* * * * * * *

Deacon Sam was the laziest man on the plantations,—by public allegation. He was a deacon of laziness, for he was a devil's disciple as a professor of religion. His name was the neighborhood's satire,—for it was the sort of a neighborhood that needed to personify and petrify its witticisms. It joked seldom, and then made a headstone out of the idiom. The cemetery was the popular show ground. Deacon Sam was among the progeny of that intelligence whose mental joints creaked like a windlass at the haw-haw of its proprietors. He was instituted formally as a curiosity. He was moreover guaranteed. His idiosyncrasies were preserved in the salt brine of popular approval. Nothing was expected of him,—except not to violate those canons of individuality the community had imparted to him. He must speak only in the tones of his consecrated and jocose character.

Naturally a stranger would be apt to regard such a man with at least a motive of curiosity. It was not compelling, but certainly a force assuring result. It was something to view a man who would insult his fellow-citizens if he went to work, especially in these days when work is made doctrinal.

Violet Montressor was in that languid land of the transplanted Frenchman, the country of the creole, where the little rivers are called bayous; and her particular stream was the Laforge. The picturesque of the country is in her moss, which envelops the tall swamps in a vast pall, cloaks every tree, and forms a frame, both real and figurative, even for the day's work of the inhabitants. Deacon Sam was pointed out to Violet as ingredient of the moss. And she bestowed on him a certain curiosity, because he was not a product of civilization but indigenous to the new landscape.

Deacon Sam now developed a unique function—he interested an attention wearied by New York.

When Violet Montressor first came to the side door, which was wreathed in rose vines, beautifying the plantation house,—a creature in the spring of beauty looking upon a spring-like bloom, she caused a smile of pleasure to pass across the heavy, coarse, benumbed, and sottish face of Deacon Sam. Intelligence gleamed upon the crudity; something fine was suddenly wrought upon the coarse clay. The great spirit that lives in the kingdom of man sought empire on a sodden face. The brute breathed the real breath of life. One could see the sunlight penetrating the swamp and darting upward between the gray veins of moss. Violet knew. As she observed the pink verbenas, so she understood the flowering of Sam.

It might be suggested whether art, of whom Violet was the triumph, was signally illustrating a victory or whether the joke was on art. But in Nature everything is useful. Violet's conquest of Sam is in her annals as important, as epochal, as the impression of Egypt upon Antony. It was a new combination, a new clash of force, a birth of opinion, an event. In the crucible of analysis the world is one.

Another morning Violet was sitting under the mossy oaks. The sun smiled lazily. The flowers were languidly gay. The only action in the landscape was in its smile. The plantation was pleasant but not energetic. Man was the same. The world of the south basked in the enjoyment of existence, but did not appear to accompany it hand in hand as did the hardy north,—it did not feed on life, it imbibed. The sunshine insisted on pouring through its pores, and the south agreeably submitted. Violet of New York and the north, deserter from energy, was sensible of these impressions, and glad of them. She rejoiced, imaginatively, in seeing a Southerner. Laziness was good. In this paradise-park was no snort of gasoline. Her smile approved the languor of the white clouds. Activity itself was distant, she wooed the world in its slumber. She was a slave-holder,—she owned Deacon Sam.

It was truly satirical that her serf was the laziest man in the world,—but she would have dismissed him had he shown a liking for work; she was the laziest woman in the world. Together they were picturesque. She saw everything in one great picture. Beyond that stretch of green, beyond the oaks, beyond the great gates, beyond the highway, on the other side of the lofty levee, the flood of Bayou Laforge whirled angrily. Of the landscape it alone was energetic. Through the swollen veins of the bayous, through the bursting artery of the Mississippi, the melting snows of the north poured in raging flood. It was battling with the pastoral temper of the South. It was swollen with the sap of youth and the strength of quick life. With virgin force it tore repressed between the dogged walls that separated the fertile fields. It was foreign and it was inimical. It growled against the voluptuous country, an invader. And the South, with extended arms, was pressing from her breast the eternal, northern foe. Of the flood, Violet in a hammock sat and dreamed.

There was good reason for No. 2 to be late. But it was not a company reason, and if reported some men on the Southern Pacific would lose their jobs. They are the engineer, the fireman, and the rest of the crew on No. 2. The reason lay in Christmas time. New Orleans is a better place in which to be on a holiday than Schriever or the Crossing.

So Michael Mann, the engineer, and the train crew, conspired to have a hot box, to waste steam and lose time, because it was Christmas, and they craftily hoped to be ordered into New Orleans. If they ran on time they would be ordered back after reaching the Crossing, and their through coach attached to the through train. But they concluded that it would be a wise plan to miss the Sunset Limited, and on account of their through coach they would be ordered to run special into the city.

It was a well-conceived plan. It would work. And it had result, even if different from expectations. God gained prayers that day because No. 2 was loitering on the way, and broke the rules of the company. It is beneficial, sometimes, not to "honor the king." But God had made Christmas for the crew.

With cripple pace, No. 2 sighted the Crossing. The Sunset Limited had rumbled over the bridge, and the steam of her whistle was curling above the plantations. The through train from the west was living up to her duty, and would land her California passengers in New Orleans on time. No. 2, the train from the valley north, that had been groaning on her route all day, escaped her connections, and the impatient occupants of her through coach could only view the slender steam of the Sunset fading before them. The Deliverer was gone, but Christmas was for the crew.

Grunting lazily, but sluggard in victory, No. 2 touched the bridge, and began to cross. Michael Mann closed down the throttle, and as he leaned from the cab window saw the faces of his young ones reflected in the whirl of the water, children and flood hovering about the image of a tree. He was the master man. He made the impatient locomotive crawl, poised triumphantly above the waves.

All day, under the ground, the levee wall was supporting itself against the tide, insinuating itself into nook and hole, eating into the heart of the dam. The secret, subterranean battle reached its climax. The cold flood lapped greedily down the outside bank. It sprang its slender stream toward the ripe crop of cane. The levee, at the point bulwarking the bridge, yielded, and the yellow flood snarled upon the fields.

Gasping, Michael Mann closed the throttle all the way down in time. The ragged bridge warned him of the plunge. Stretched from his cab window, he looked to the end of the train, and met the brakeman's signal to stand still. He was horror-struck. The train could not be moved. The flood had torn away the other end of the bridge.

The stranded engine snorted above the flood, but its defiance was puny to the roar of the deep. It was like a wrestler caught up on the back of the victor.

Trembling in death agony, the train stood stationary above the tide, which clamored for its life. The shreds of the bridge shook with every fresh assault below, shrinking from the crunching teeth of the torrent. And No. 2, perfect in part and whole, with steam up, Michael's hand ready for the nervous throttle, snorted with thwarted majesty in mid air. Her passengers, hardly yet grasping the situation, crossed in a pale fashion from the car windows. The tide roared mercilessly upon them. It had counted its victims, surrounded by a watery host, which was supported by the two flanks of the crevasse. Cruelty had never been more cunning. There was perfection in the strategy of the waters.

All hands, master and men, women and children, crowded down the levee to the crevasse, gaping upon the spectacle of the fated train. A timber from the bridge plunged into the water. The crowd cried, some ran wildly, some wept.

In the front rank was Violet, with Deacon Sam. A fatal magnetism attracted her toward the train. She saw a passenger, a speck above the whirlpool, crawl from his coach, and stand solitary upon the top of the car. He was easily recognizable, calm and cool above the ready grave, and he was The Man, who had come down from New York, the man who had consumed two hours every day.

"Save him, Deacon, if you can." Violet's numbed brain urged her slave. The words were like the wind soughing through the gates of death. Deacon Sam, smiling apishly, glanced at Violet, and vacant of the fear of danger, darted to the ragged edge of the levee at the crevasse. He was liable to be consumed instantly by the tide. He climbed over the stone parapets whereon the bridge had stood. Moored uncertainly to them was a heavy tree trunk swept thereupon by the stream. "Help me, some of yo'," Sam appealed for volunteers. None answered. The tragedy of No. 2 seemed sealed. Sam, half-stripped, stood waist deep in the water on the stone, his shining back braced against the levee wall. His heavy groan as he bent to his lone labor shocked the foremost of his audience, which had ventured nearer the crevasse.

The black Hercules, levering the trunk upon his back, lifted it, sizzling with the drip, aloft in air. He staggered, and with true aim, let it fall forward. The trunk struck the bridge heavily; it shook, but it did not fall, and in a moment had been created a perilous causeway between the trainful and the broken levee.

One by one, child, woman, man, the people in peril slid by guide rope down the timber bridge. They were rushed from the verge of the crevasse. The passengers were every one saved. And when they were all in, the train plunged.

The supper table was spread at Sherry's. Without, the Avenue was merry, in the jingle of Christmas bell and the snap of Christmas cold. It was night, and the world was glad. And in the swift dance was gathered every light and sound, each whirl of car, clatter of hoof, and voice of man.

But at the supper table there was a glad quiet. The company sat down after play.

"I wish to propose a toast," said Ralph Addisonne, rising. "It's a little old, a year old, but mellow, I hope,—the Christmas of the Crevasse." He smiled straight away at his wife.

"I want to supplement it," said Violet. "It is to The Man."

"But first let us religiously perform the ceremony of refilling the glasses," said her husband. "Your service, Deacon Sam."

The black man, clad in white, stepped forward, and slowly poured the champagne.

The Flight of the Countess

BY IRENE CONNELL.

International marriages are so common nowadays that when Violet Osbourne wedded Count Raoul de Guenedec of Brittany the little ripple of excitement created thereby did not spread beyond mere local circles. Penniless Breton counts are not much to boast of.

Mrs. and Miss Osbourne were doing Europe—their first trip—and being rather inexperienced in the matter of titles they snapped up the first one that offered.

The marriage ceremony took place in San Francisco. Violet and her mamma would have preferred it to be solemnized abroad without the presence of Mr. Osbourne, whom, truth to tell, they snubbed in most matters, being not a little ashamed of him. He was, indeed, an awkward contrast to the elegant Count Raoul. But the Count had reasons of his own (chiefly financial) for wishing to be married in America, and the presence of Osbourne pere was indispensable in the matter of settlements. So the ladies came home with their trunks full of finery, dutiable and undutiable, and the Count followed them with his man of affairs.

The wedding ceremony was performed by a high ecclesiastical dignitary, at the Osbourne residence, newly furbished and decorated for the occasion. It is said that the Count nearly withdrew from the alliance at the last moment, the settlements not being to his liking. The final arrangements were, however, satisfactory to the titled son-in-law, less so to old Osbourne, who damned his daughter's choice without stint. The young couple left at once for Europe. Violet expected to live in Paris. For what else did she marry a Frenchman? To her Paris meant France, and France, Paris.

The ancestral home of the De Guenedecs was in Brittany, one of those corners of the world apparently left behind by the march of progress. The chateau is old and ruinous and its interior bare and comfortless to a degree beyond the imagination of an American. Its two extinguisher-capped towers overlook the salt marshes and the sea. The mother and aunt of Raoul presided over the destinies of the chateau, and ruled their few servants with almost feudal authority. Time was when the family owned the lands and the salt marshes, but that is long past. The old women were poor and penurious, and employed their time in knitting and devotion. Raoul was left fatherless at an early age, but as soon as he could free himself from maternal control he escaped to Paris, where he led the life of a man of the world, and accumulated debts which he hoped in time to liquidate by a rich marriage. For Violet he had a certain penchant. She amused him, but not so much as a certain little danseuse who was costing him an extravagant amount of money just then.

As a bride Violet was happy enough. She and her husband lived for a time in Paris, but previous to the birth of her child the young couple went down to the chateau of the De Guenedecs. The young Countess did not relish provincial life, but was willing to do anything to please her husband. She wished to have a suite of rooms modernized and fitted up for her own use, and was surprised at the opposition she met on the part of the two old ladies. To begin with, Raoul had married without his mother's consent, and besides, the Breton women showed on general principles small respect for "the American." The white boudoir and the bathroom of the young wife scandalized them. "An honest woman does not need a bath every day" was their comment. "She has more dresses at once than I have had in my whole life," complained the old Countess. "She, the American, the paysanne."

Violet was very proud of her baby, a boy. But now her real troubles began, especially as Raoul soon went back to Paris. The doctor would not permit the mother and infant to follow, declaring that the air and milk of Paris would work harm to the child.

The young American mother had her prejudices as to how babies should be brought up, and the two old Breton ladies had theirs. They provided little Raoul with a bonne who could not even speak French, much less English, and between them they ruled over all the details of his daily life. Violet wept bitter tears, but it was of no use.

"I hate those ugly, uncomfortable caps," said she. "American babies are so much prettier with their heads bare."

"It has always been the custom with us," replied the grandmother, "and it is the proper way."

Whenever Violet appealed to her husband in any dispute he would reply:

"You are not an American any more, petite. When you married me you became a Frenchwoman. You must let my mother have her way."

The Count's visits to the chateau became less and less frequent. He had tired of the marshes and the sea, and besides, the little dancer had resumed her sway, the more easily that now he had plenty of American dollars to burn. Violet, on the contrary, found that she had not a sou to call her own. She now began to realize what it meant when all her income was settled on her husband. The old Countess and Aunt Gudule smiled with malice. Her money was very good; for the rest they treated her with contempt. More and more they kept her boy from her. They made her feel that he belonged to the De Guenedecs and not to her. She was an alien, deprived of her child, deserted by her husband, and despised by his kindred. Her own mother died and she now felt with sharp regret how unkindly she had treated her father.

Her one resource was to take long rambles, planning some mode of escape from her surroundings, and watching mechanically the peasant women digging potatoes in their colored sleeves and petticoats, red stockings and strange coiffes, or the white-robed paludiers in their baggy trousers gathering salt from the marshes. She found something congenial in the desolate, sandy coast and the rocky moors, with their scrub oaks and fragrant sea-pinks. She secreted all her money and jewels about her person, feeling a presentiment that she would need them in some sudden emergency. In the nearest village there was an old church dating from the fifteenth century. Occasionally a stray tourist would go out of the beaten way to visit it, attracted by its quaint architecture and by its altar of black granite, where the sailors hung their votive offerings when preserved from shipwreck. Violet haunted alike the old church and the Druid stones, hoping to come across some one whom she had ever known. Needless to say, the ladies of the chateau did not countenance these pilgrimages.

"No lady does these things," they said. As to themselves, they went only to church or on visits of charity, and were invariably accompanied by a servant. Their only visitor was the cure who came to dine and to play a game of cards.

So time wore along until little Raoul had completed his second year. It was now Christmas eve, and the pious Bretons assembled for the midnight mass. From far and wide they came across the snow, the people of the chateau among the others. The bonne did not wish to miss the mass and Violet offered to remain at home with her boy. To this the grandmother at once dissented; all must go, baby should be wrapped up and taken along. He must see the lights and the creche. So they all went on foot, old Pierre carrying the lantern. Baby soon tired of the service, and Violet, seeing that he was becoming fretful, took him from the arms of the bonne and carried him out of the church, regardless of the stern glances of the old Countess, who could not remonstrate verbally in the midst of High Mass. It was a cold, clear night and myriads of stars twinkled in the depths of the sky.

Into the night suddenly came the crunch of wheels and the sound of voices, English—no, American voices.

"Here we are at last, Will, and see, the service is going on."

"Well, of all the notions, Stella——" The rest died away in a good natured growl.

"Oh, I wanted to see this above all things. I just love these quaint people."

Violet's heart stood still. The woman was Stella Main, and the man was Will Tozer, and they were from San Francisco.

"Stella, don't you know me?"

"Violet, in heaven's name! What are you doing here? But surely you know Will. We are on our wedding trip."

"Thank God! Stella, do not ask me a single question, but take us this minute, just as we are, away from here. I suppose you came from Batz?"

"Yes, we are doing this part of the country. But what is the matter? Why——"

"Do not ask me. Do not stop a moment. I will tell you everything."

So Violet and the baby were taken up, and were gone before Mass was over. Tozer knew that a little English vessel left Sainte Marie next morning, and the fugitives were taken on board.

"Stella, get down on your knees every day of your life and thank God that you are married to an American," said Violet at parting.

The De Guenedec divorce suit was sensational. Both sides wanted the child, but it ended in Violet getting her son and the Count keeping her money. Some curious points of law were touched upon—for example, the doubtful legality of the marriage, owing to the formal consent of the Count's mother never having been obtained. I do not believe that little Raoul will ever claim the De Guenedec title and estates.

CHANT OF THE CITY ROYAL

Stay, stay a little! ye who claim—
Kings bred of kings, the boon of birth
Begotten of Franciscan earth,—
Sons of her strength and fame!
Unto my chant your hearts recalling,
Come listen, and about me throng;
I lift our splendid city's song—
Before her feet the years are falling
Where vast the auroral futures glow,
Urging me pay the debt I owe and still must owe.

Hail, City! Mother City, hail!
I greet thee, climbing slow aloft
Thy twin and pointed peaks where oft
I scanned thee, height and vale.
O fair metropolis! O shining!
Whose limbs, whose face, in light or mist,
The sun, the seas, the winds have kissed!
Whence comes this vision, this divining
That marks the towering years dilate
Portentously august and charged with wondrous fate?

So far-come, old Castilians viewed
From carven poops of barks that lay
With kelpy bottoms in thy bay,
Thy virgin beauty nude.
So to their eyes the cloud-domes soaring
Of filmy fabrics laced the air,
Though bare thy golden dunes and bare
Thy beaches where the surf fell roaring.
Those dark and dreaming mariners beheld
Entranced, the crystal fanes aerial magic spelled.

Strong generations' lapsing tides
Gave thee their blood prolific,—O!
Great art thou yet shalt greater grow
As Time with Progress strides.
Thou youngest queen of giantesses!
Dear, dear to me thy goddess growth;
I bask on thy wide bosom loth
To leave the tangle of thy tresses.
Fervor and fancy may outpour
From louder reeds than mine, yet who shall love thee more?

Behold the town, behold her bay!
Green, slumbering isles behold, and o'er
Yon waves the fair and farther shore
And mountains' crowned array.
The white, still, stately ferries gliding,
The ships of sail at anchor-rest,
The black-hulled ships of steam abreast
Their iron battle-brethren riding,
And swift the fishing craft that leap
With dark wine-colored sails to drag the swarming deep.

Roofs like the troubled seas! O spires!
Domes, teeming things that upward lift
Where swamps the sun or purple drift
Of smoke proclaims your fires;
Bright streets the serried hills ascending
Of marshalled mansions gay or dumb,
Traversed by engine-wains that come
And go, their gleaming pathway wending—
O peaks, O gardens, parks and squares,
Wind-wafted odors of the seas and blithe Valkyrie airs!

A distant whir ascends the South
As gulfed within a dream. It thrills
Through tremblings where a myriad mills
Sound music from thy mouth.
The black smoke-genii roll and tumble
From funnels twined with flame and steam,
While shrill at noon and vesper scream
Thy sirens and thy engines rumble
Through furnace-flash and forge's glow—
One heats thee,City,into life, one shapes thee, blow by blow!

Unto thy bosom's magnet vast,
Firm-centred in thy seven hills,
Earth's ultimate quick iron thrills
And seeks thee out at last!
From world-ports all the bland Pacific
Is tracked by rushing prows with foam;
They seek thy harbor and their home;
They seek thee, mother beatific!
A thousand wind-worn masts point high
And silken from their polished spars the flaunting nations fly.

To thee the pregnant vessels run
Low-dipping, then, departing, bear
Hulls freighting spoil of regions rare
Loved by a wilder sun.
Thee raptured steel of rails clear-ringing,
Greets ever with incessant yields
Of twelve-month's tribute from the fields,
The ores, the fruits, the forests bringing
From mountain-mass and valley floor
Who, bursting on thy dais-steps their cornucopias pour.

Sail! peaceful, peaceful keels that sweep
In white armadas from these shores—
Sail! Commerce-crowned with precious stores,
Ye cygnets of the deep!
From burning spice-isles Oriental,
Dim, pearly archipelagoes,
A sparkle-darting star arose
Above these gateways Occidental.
Its fire flared auspicious sign—
Rule o'er far regions of the East, Great City, shall be thine.

Our Hellas of the Western deep
Anoints thee queen nor long shall wait
The huge gestation of the state
That lies in thee asleep.
Yet great in greater realms thy glory—
Here Art shall rear a nobler race
Than any that hath built its place
In nation's stone or nation's story.
Spirits of native light shall draw
Compelling urgings from thy breasts so holy-hedged with awe.

Soon may yon sundered oceans mix
Their isthmian waves nor fend from thee
World-homage thine—o'er subject sea
And land,—Imperatrix!
Tongues of thy truest bards shall praise thee,
Nurse valiant of the master arts,
For thou within their minds and hearts
Hast blown the fire whose light repays thee.
Bow to her, waves! where midst your foam,
Seven-set on circling hills she shines, our new, our nobler Rome!

A Christmas Hodge-Podge

BY E. D. PRICE.

It was the night before Christmas. The merry jingle of sleigh bells rang out sharply upon the clear, frosty air and the gentle patter of reindeer hoofs upon the roof heralded the glad approach of the good Santa Claus. All swathed in huge furs, his ruddy face tingling from the biting blast and his whiskers sparkling with hoar frost, the jolly old gift bearer leaped nimbly from his quaintly carved sledge and, peering down the dark chimney, chuckled softly with delight.

At least that is what he would have done in the children's story books, but, of course, it is all very different in these up to date times. Reindeer are practically extinct in our great metropolitan centres and heavy rainfalls ruin the sleighing.

And so the up to date Santa Claus came in an electrical airship that was forever getting out of kilter and letting him down on the wrong roof. And instead of being wrapped in furs he wore a porous plaster and a waterproof and carried a venerable umbrella which leaked down the back of his neck. The rain ran in rivulets down his long white beard and he coughed dismally.

"It is a terrible night," he muttered hoarsely, "and this Christmas business will be the death of me yet. Thank goodness, I've only one more soubrette on my list. Third flat West, Montmorency bell. I'm blamed if I wouldn't give her the go-by, except that she behaves well to her mother."

He paused hastily in the act of descent and withdrew his rheumatic leg, with a little exclamation of pain.

"How stupid of me to try the chimney," he grumbled. "It's another of those steam-heated flats." And then wearily and cautiously he felt his way down the dripping, slippery fire escape.

All was hushed and quiet as the grave in the little soubrette boudoir. It was only three o'clock A. M. and quite too early for its fair occupant to have returned from the all-night lobster emporium. Not even the faintest glimmer of light came through the transom, but the good Santa Claus tiptoed carefully about the snug apartment, endeavoring to track up the carpet as little as possible, until finally his outstretched hand came into contact with the something soft and silken for which he was searching.

"She expected me," he said good humoredly, "and has hung up both her stockings. It shall be a glad homecoming for the little one who is good to her mother."

And then from his capacious rubber sack he withdrew the gift offerings and dropped them, one by one, into the yawning receptacles. There was a sweet little silver toilette set with her monogram, lovely marquise rings of fairest turquoise, superb stars and crescents and brooches of diamonds so brilliant that they glowed in the darkness with phosphorescent glare, and jeweled hatpins, and perfumery and candy and costly violets—everything in rich profusion that could gladden the heart of the blonde young woman of the merry chorus.

"They must be fairly running over," he said delightedly, and then he cautiously inserted his hand, but could feel nothing. Hesitating for an instant, he crowded in the real Alaska sealskin jacket. It was swallowed up as by a quicksand.

Puzzled and disturbed, Santa Claus struck a match and lighted the gas jet; then he started back in amazement.

"These are not stockings," he exclaimed angrily, "she has tried to ring in a whole pair of tights. Now here is what happens when an avaricious young person overplays the limit."

Dumping every precious thing back into the sack, he hurried away in high dudgeon, and the faint whir of his dynamo announced that he had taken flight.

When Mabel Montmorency, her fair young face all aglow with expectation, hastened home half an hour later, the empty tights fluttered idly in the damp breeze and the lace curtains were rain sodden and quite spoiled. Santa Claus had not even bothered to close the window. And he had revengefully cribbed the last bottle of beer in the ice box.

When the overtaxed business man's friends came bearing gifts and wishing him a Merry Christmas, and he grinned awkwardly and replied, "The same to you," he could not repress a forlorn hope that somebody would give him something he really wanted. He did not exactly know what he wanted, but he had a firm conviction that he would recognize it if he saw it.

As he began with trembling fingers to undo the first package he experienced a sudden thrill of gratification. At least it wasn't a match box. The year before everybody who remembered him at all gave him match boxes. He had carefully stacked them away upon an attic shelf and had gone on carrying matches loose in his vest pocket, and constantly mistaking them for toothpicks.

This package at least contained something else. It was too large for a match box. Ah, yes, it was a calendar—a very pretty calendar in a leather case. A calendar is always useful. This would be just the thing for his desk. Had the thoughtful donor remained for acknowledgement the recipient would have said from his heart: "You, at least, have good taste and excellent judgment. You could not possibly have pleased me better; a calendar was exactly what I wanted."

It was with some misgivings that the man untied the second package. It felt as if it might contain a calendar. And it did. It represented a brazen undressed coryphee posing in front of a dial. Her left foot was firmly planted at the half-hour point. The other was high above her head. She had evidently been taken at two minutes of six. The man put it by with a stifled sigh. He could not carry it home. It would never do to let the children see it. The youthful mind is susceptible to impressions.

The oblong box felt heavy and looked encouraging. Beneath the cover was a thick layer of excelsior. The man dug into this and then swore softly as he exhumed a gunmetal calendar with brass trimmings. For the first time in his life he bitterly regretted not owning a dog. He would have liked one to throw it at.

One after another the bundles were opened. The man's friends have evidently cornered the calendar market and unloaded upon him. There was the red tissue paper affair with the tiny Chinese lanterns draped along the edge and the wash house hieroglyphics. There was the winter landscape calendar, with blue snowflakes falling gently on the pink cottage and the purple cows in the foreground.

There was the calendar with the birch bark backing, and raffia straw fringe and the Indian head and tomahawk and tom-tom in blue and yellow beadwork. There was one from the never idle comedienne whom he had taken to supper one evening when there had been words at the house and he had gone down town morose, misanthropic and convinced that his wife had never understood him. It bore the lady's portrait, showing all her teeth and jewelry, and extolled her marvelous success in vaudeville.

And there was the dinky little ivory calendar, with the movable date cards that no one ever remembered to change. Incidentally there was a dozen or so of advertising calendars testifying to the superior merits of various beers, five-cent cigars, health foods, endowment policies and great lines of railway transportation. They were all inscribed "Compliments of the Season."

The man turned wearily to his accumulated stack of letters. Those that did not contain unreceipted bills, enclosed picture cards wishing him a Merry Christmas, and there were tiny calendar pads gummed on them. Then he went out, and on his way home bought himself a fifty-cent necktie and told the clerk to charge it.

As he opened the door of his modest flat the man's wife flew at him with smiling and happy face. She was laboring under suppressed excitement.

"My darling," she cried softly, "I haven't much to give you this year, but I know you will value my little gift, not for its intrinsic value, but because it is my own handiwork. It is something very useful, and every time you look at it you will be reminded of me."

Then she burrowed into her favorite hiding place under the bed and proudly produced the hand-painted calendar, decorated with forget-me-nots and poetic sentiments signifying fond remembrance.

A moment later the door bell rang sharply. It was the Dutch delivery boy from the corner grocery. "I haf prought you von of our soufenir kalendars," he said stolidly. "Der boss he vish you a Merry Christmus, and vould like to know if you could sent him der money allreatty. It is over two veeks now."

What an ideal death was that of Remenyi, the grand old violinist—thrilling a vast audience by the sweep of his magic bow and falling lifeless as he fingered the sparkling notes of the Pizzicati.

It is a grand thing, this preservation of one's usefulness to the final moment and the consolation of being able to die in harness.

John McCullough, the stalwart, big-hearted exponent of the robust in tragic art, sat moodily one rainy Christmas night in a Detroit hotel, taking a very gloomy view of life indeed. The golden dream of conquest had been dissipated when his banker, friend and patron, Ralston, plunged to his death in the waters of San Francisco bay.

The tragedian had returned East to begin all over again, but fortune as yet frowned upon him. He had played that holiday night to a handful of people in a theatre which was to be thronged with his clamorous admirers less than two years later.

The three friends who were present sought to rouse him from melancholy reverie and failed most miserably.

Suddenly there was a knock at the door and in strode a merry little man, with a shining bald pate, who cried cheerily:

"I am Remenyi, the fiddler. They told me you were here, and I am come to introduce myself."

There was a firm clasp of the hands, and two strong, magnetic men were friends upon the instant, as if their comradeship had been lifelong.

"Come, cheer up," said the violinist. "You are blue? Well, we shall see about that. It is not good to be sad at Christmas time. Wait for a moment; I shall get my fiddle."

And five minutes later he was hustling back again with his rare old Stradivarius. His ruddy face radiant with good humor, he looked for all the world like one of those jolly old monks the painter's art has depicted, roaring with delight over a piquant tale.

Then he played. His instrument thrilled beneath his touch like a living creature, and great waves of melody rippled and swelled until the dim, gloomy apartment seemed all aglow with the radiance of fairyland.

The soft, dreamy waltz movements of Strauss, the stormy strains of Wagner, the weird, eerie-like airs of his own well beloved Hungary, followed one upon the other and no word was spoken.

It was long after midnight when he ceased, and throwing the bow from him said abruptly, "But I have bored you sufficiently. Good-night, my friend, and good luck journey with you."

"Good-night, grand artist," replied the tragedian. "You have given me new life, new hope. God bless you."

Of the men who sat enthralled beneath the spell of Remenyi's splendid art that rainy Christmas night, but one survives, and it is he who writes these lines. The ways of Providence are indeed mysterious, and passeth all understanding.

* * * * * * *

The roar and rattle of traffic, the harsh, unintelligible cries of street vendors, the brazen clang of cable car gongs and the shrill, strident shouts of children at play were wafted through the half-open windows of the sick chamber upon this clear, crisp, clamorous Christmas morn.

They were all alert with vitality and virility. They proclaimed life and action and were strangely at variance with the indefinable hush and stillness of impending death.

The dying man gave no heed to the disturbing uproar of the busy outside world. His lack-lustre eyes stared steadily at the whitewashed ceiling of the mean apartment as if striving to penetrate the mysteries of the great unknown beyond. An eternity of exploration and expiation lay before him but his dulled and wavering senses were fascinated by the fancies of curious conjecture.

One might have thought him already dead but for the nervous movement of his white, wasted fingers plucking peevishly at the soiled counterpane.

There were no sorrowing friends at his bedside. For him the Christmas chime and carol had no significance. Now that his time had come he was dying as he had lived, alone, shunned, despised and rejected of his fellows.

The charity hospital nurse, not unkindly, but calloused by long years of ill-requited service to the suffering, bent over him perfunctorily, with stereotyped queries. Was he more comfortable now? Was there any message that he desired to leave? Was there anything he wished?

He shook his head silently, still staring at something invisible to mortal eye and picking, picking, peevishly at the soiled counterpane.

Suddenly the expiring flame in the burned-out socket of mortality seemed to flicker for an instant and to blaze up afresh.

His eyes grew brighter, there was a faint flush upon the pallid, unshaven cheek and his voice rang out with something of its old resonance.

"Yes, there is one thing—my epitaph," he said, very clearly and distinctly. "I am only a theatrical press agent but I suppose I am entitled to an epitaph. It must be crisp, concise and significant of a life created for good and perverted to evil. Place upon my headstone this one brief sentence:

HERE LIES

His head fell back limply. There was a quick, sharp death-rattle in his throat. He lay very quietly, a strange smile upon his lips.

The hard-featured nurse listened attentively, with well trained ear, for an instant, and drew the sheet reverently over the still, ashen face. Then she began to tidy up the room.

Some Christmas Reflections

Christmas comes but once a year. We are thankful for that much. —The Pessimist.

If wishes were horses a poor man might afford to keep Christmas. —The Pauper.

The giver of Christmas gifts grumbles because he gives; the recipient grumbles for the obligation that the gift entails, so only the shop-keeper is benefited.

But there is a melancholy satisfaction in knowing that the other fellow feels just as badly about it.

If Christ came to earth again on His birthday, He would doubtless be surprised to find so little of that which He wanted most to leave us—"peace on earth, good will to men." —The Cynic.

A Transplanted Jenkins

BY SARAH WILLIAMSON.

It all came over Molly with a great rush as she sat in the grand stand watching the horses fly to victory or defeat. It was like a tidal wave of nostalgia.

When she saw Tom Lewis gazing about him with a worried look, she knew at once what she would do. Molly had seen that harassed expression on reporters' faces before. She understood what it portended this time. The detail was not fully covered. Like a flash it came to her—the great "Charity Christmas Meet," and the Society Reporter was not there!

* * * * * * *

At first it had been delightful to Molly. She enjoyed wearing her smart frocks, having salesmen and saleswomen kowtow to her, and driving up to the theatre or concert-hall in her own private equipage. It was so soothing to have the doorkeeper—who often used to turn her down sans merci in the old days when she solicited admission on her newspaper credentials—show her the deference only given to the very rich.

She was no longer Molly, but Mary to her husband and Marie to his sister, who had traveled and still affected a Parisian turn to her tongue. Her cards read "Mrs. Gerson," for she was that, the dowager Madame having passed away a few months before her son's marriage.

Mary Gerson found it vastly amusing to be on the inside of things. She had once been permitted peeps behind the curtain, when she started her career. They had put her on society details until she worked up to an inside position. Now she could sneer from her lofty perch at the haughty ladies who had so often patronized her when she had asked the privilege of publishing their daughters' portraits with the announcement of their debut or betrothal.

That was not so long ago, either, but none of these proud dames appeared to recognize in Schuyler Gerson's beautiful young wife "that impertinent reporter from the Orb." How could they? The Gersons' social position was unimpeachable.

Gerson had fallen in love with Molly on her last vacation, which she was spending at a mutual friend's eyrie up in the Sierras. As he was used to having what he wished, and Molly could not resist his pleading, they were married almost immediately after the proposal. She had requested her newspaper friends to suppress any slush they had intended to write about the affair, and that is why no one in Schuyler's set thought of, or dared if they knew, to make any loud comments on Gerson's choice. There was nothing snobbish about Molly. She would have preferred to have everybody connect her with the old Molly, but Schuyler ignored her desire and his sister always swished the subject when Molly introduced anything that savored of shop talk. So in time she laid the shop away in a dark corner of her memory. It was not dead, only sleeping, but it slept soundly.

At first Molly enjoyed it all, the novelty of being IT where she had been a cipher. She did not miss her work, for Society's claims were many. She was invited everywhere, and she went to teas and luncheons, dinners and dances, until they lost their newness and became a bore. They would have been more of a bore had not Molly retained her old habit of observation to help her out. She looked beyond and beneath the surface, and the pretensions of these smart people amused her. She remembered some of them in other aspects in days gone by, their smallness, snobbishness, and their subterfuges when they wanted their daughters' names to go into the papers yet veiled their eagerness for notoriety in a cold scorn of all publicity.

Mary Gerson looked down at Tom Lewis's perplexed, scowling brow, and she laughed a little, quiet laugh. How easily she could banish that frown! Dear old Tom! It was he who had christened her "Mollykins," which pet name the office in general had afterwards adopted. To be sure, she mused, they had been familiar sometimes. But it was not the familiarity of discourtesy; rather the rough, kindly attentions of big brothers to a younger sister. One time they had made a wager that the Sporting Editor should steal a kiss from Mollykins. She remembered how it came about. The Police Reporter and the Court Reporter held her hands while the Sporting Editor snatched the kiss. She was very angry and would not speak to any of them for a whole day. But the next morning she found her desk covered with sweet, fresh violets, and forgot her wrath in contemplating the beauty and inhaling the fragrance of the purple blooms.

She had never told her husband, or his sister, of that little episode. Schuyler would not have understood it. He would have considered it an insult and might have suggested thrashing the Sporting Editor—though Molly and Schuyler were strangers at the time the incident occurred.

Until she saw Tom Lewis frowning at the horses Molly did not miss the old life. She forgot her desk and the inkpot while Society and its pleasures were young. It was so delightful to be free from care and financial worry; to live in a grand house with a retinue of servants instead of in a tiny apartment shared with two other girls, and only the house Jap to help out on state occasions in the work.

* * * * * * *

Tom Lewis was scanning the spectators in the grand stand. His eyes caught those of a smartly gowned young woman with a gold-mounted lorgnette upraised. There was an exchange of nods, a bit of wireless telegraphy that told of aid wanted and help promised.

Schuyler was down among the bookies in the arena. In an instant Mrs. Gerson found herself at the gate by Tom Lewis's side.

"Will you, really?" he said eagerly. "Miss Jones 'phoned just half an hour ago that she was too ill to be out. And Miss Starr is doing a children's ball and three Christmas dinner-parties. The Day and the Hexameter have the cream of their staffs out, but we're awfully short."

"I'll cover Miss Jones's and Miss Starr's part," said Molly, "I've been here long enough to see all the people, and I'll string you out three columns easily."

* * * * * * *

While Schuyler Gerson was madly searching for a missing wife at the races, the missing wife was scribbling for dear life at her old desk in the Orb office. Her hair was touzled, ink-spots adorned her gown, and her sealskin and hat were thrown carelessly across a chair.

Her eyes sparkled and she dashed off page after page of what she assured the City Editor, who stood by gazing admiringly at his old assistant, was "rattling good stuff."

As she tossed her pen on the desk with the last page, Molly heaved a great sigh. She opened her eyes and came back to life with a start.

"What have I done?" she cried, "my husband will be looking everywhere for me. Just ring up my house, will you, and tell Schuyler I'm safe?"

The City Editor helped her on with her coat, and in the absence of a mirror assured her when her hat was at the proper angle.

"We miss you awfully, Mollykins," he said, "you're an immense loss to the force."

Molly sighed again.

"And what do you think of me?" she said, "going back—after this?"

"Why—don't you want to go back?"

"Ask the partially cured dram-drinker, when he's given a taste of his old love."

Then Mrs. Gerson, with a shake-hands all around, and followed by regretful, admiring eyes, swept out of the office.

* * * * * * *

A few hours later she was presiding with charming grace at an elaborate Christmas dinner at which the guests were a picked twenty of the most exclusive Gersons and their connections. She acted her part well, and her husband's approval went side by side with that of his aristocratic relatives. But Molly, with inward recollection of the afternoon's mad freak, experienced again that wave of homesickness.

To herself she felt like an actress playing an unwelcome role—but it had been her own choice.

Hearts

A Christmas Story.

BY LOUIS J. STELLMAN.

It was Mrs. Carol's first Christmas in California. She gazed out of the window, half resenting the sunshine and the odor of flowers that came from the garden below; half expecting to awake from a dream and see the familiar snow-covered landscape, stretching, flat and desolate, to the point where a lead-colored sky cut it sharply and formed the upper half of a curtain upon which black silhouettes of trees and buildings seemed to have been painted with a nervous hand. Mrs. Carol had become so used to this setting for the winter holidays that she missed it, as one does, sometimes, a cherished grief. Mrs. Carol was pale and dreamy—and sadness became her delicate features so well that she cultivated it.

She felt the joyous stimulus of this California Christmas morning in contrast to her mood, with the sharp annoyance that comes to a woman in the consciousness that her gown is not becoming or unsuitable to the occasion. How could one say soft, pathetic things when the sunlight glared—yes, positively glared—in aggressive brightness. And it was, before all, Mrs. Carol's desire to impress her companion with the glamour of delicate grief.

She sighed softly. "Everything is so gay and happy here," she said at length. "Poor Dick! it will be a lonesome Christmas for him."

Bayden looked up quickly. He had been watching the sunshine filter through her hair—Mrs. Carol had wonderful hair—his mind full of half-formed thoughts.

"Who is Dick?" he asked, jealously, "oh—ah—Mr. Carol, I suppose."

"Yes," affirmed Mrs. Carol, without turning. Bayden's tone proved that her pose was effective. "I call him Dick, though that's his middle name. He's working very hard to give me this vacation—and he'll be awfully lonely today. I would have staid, but the doctor insisted—one can never tell what one of these neglected colds will develop into, you know. I'm quite over it now, but he writes me to stay another month and take no chances. He's very unselfish, Dick is. I suppose he'll hunt up some of his bachelor friends at the club—but it won't be the same, of course, and I feel rather guilty and selfish." Her eyes were turned to his appealingly.

Bayden laid a hand timidly on hers. He was a boyish-looking fellow who seemed to peer, darkly, through the glass of untried ideals.

"Oh, I wouldn't look at it in that way," he returned. "I'm sure your health is of paramount importance to your husband. And you give him so much of your thought. . . . I wish," he continued, haltingly, —"it's selfish, I know—but I wish, sometimes—you'd give me a little more of it." He withdrew his hand quickly, as though realizing that he had committed an indiscretion.

Mrs. Carol groaned inwardly. At first she had been attracted by his seriousness, but later she was forced to realize that a lack of humor has its inevitable concomitant of embarrassing crudity.

If he had only said: "Oh, can't we forget Dick for a little while? I'm growing awfully jealous of that husband of yours," or, again, "What's the use of worrying about Dick? He's a thousand miles away. Be good to me. I'm here—and entirely innocuous."

Thus Mrs. Carol reflected in the momentary silence before she replied. She was used to that sort of thing. But then, it was hardly to be expected of Bayden, and she, herself, had set the pace. She had done it because Bayden seemed positively too negative to set one himself—and he was novel enough to be amusing.

So Mrs. Carol turned away, as if confused. "Dear friend," she told him, "I do. That's what made me feel guilty. I have enjoyed your companionship so much. I'm afraid I haven't thought of Dick enough. That's why——" she stopped abruptly.

Bayden arose and took a step toward her. The worship in his face was unmistakable. But her eyes stopped him. It was her one cross in this relationship—that she could control him so easily—for she knew that somewhere within him lurked a fire which seemed alluringly dangerous. She arose, also, slowly and languidly.

"Come," she said, "we will go into the garden—this winter paradox of yours—and pick flowers. Afterward you may take me to dine. The idea of a Christmas dinner at the hotel appalls me. Let us go to the quaint little Spanish place, where every dish is a mysterious delight. After all, there's no use in worrying over—Dick."

A change passed over Bayden's features.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, "that will be great. I'll telephone for a table as we go through the office. It's apt to be crowded tonight"

Snatches of his conversation came to her through the door of the telephone booth, which Bayden had left open.

"Private room . . . table for two . . . Yes, wine. . . Amontillado."

His tone seemed unnecessarily loud. People were standing about and it seemed to her that some of them smiled as Bayden rejoined her.

She turned to him angrily. "Do you want to compromise me?" she asked.

He returned her look, calmly.

"Not for the world," he answered. "Don't be foolish. Come, let's pick the flowers."

Mrs. Carol ceased, suddenly, to be entirely sure of herself—or was it of him? She did not know. However, she made no reply, and they passed, silently, out of the door.

* * * * * * *

At Mrs. Carol's request, they dismissed the cab when the business quarter was reached. It was early and they traversed, slowly, some of the principal thoroughfares of the shopping district. On the way they had passed many residences aglow with light, the windows hung with wreaths or garlanded with holly. Some were open, for the night was fine, and from these came sounds of childish laughter over toys that Santa Claus had brought. Here and there a Christmas tree gleamed and scintillated in tinsel bravery.

On the down-town streets one met another element: shop girls, and clerks, sailors, roisterers, what not—the cosmopolitan, homeless throng found only in a large city—gay of attire and happy of mien, gazing into shop windows, chattering in different tongues, all imbued with holiday effervescence. A blind man, playing a hand-organ; a wooden-legged soldier, operating an uncanny graphophone; a street-fakir, surrounded by the usual throng; a band of Salvationists; a woman singing carols to the accompaniment of an accordion—all of them reaping the harvest of Yuletide generosity and good will.

As they reached the Spanish quarter, the scene changed again. A group of swarthy serenaders ceased their music to scramble wildly for small coins which a drunken opera singer was tossing from a window. Women in bright-hued shawls with children in their arms gossiped on doorsteps. In the windows of stores and fruit-stalls hung colored prints of the Madonna. Somewhere, in the distance, a church bell tolled.

At Larini's they found a gay crowd in the main dining-room, drinking red wine and eating steaming foods. Multi-colored festoons of tissue paper contrasted oddly with the dingy walls and ceiling ornamented with strings of chili-peppers and evergreens.

Larini, himself, resplendent in evening dress, received them with effusive hospitality. The apartment to which he conducted them was a small, box-like affair at the end of a tier of similar ones opening upon a narrow passage. It contained a table covered with a passably clean linen and set with the regulation olla and ancient silver castor. A small bouquet of red roses stood in the centre.

Larini withdrew, bowing, and left them facing each other across the narrow board. Mrs. Carol seemed strangely quiet as she tugged at her gloves. She was forcibly conscious of Bayden's glance. Once, when her eyes met his, she looked down, quickly, and shivered a little.

"Are you cold?" he asked solicitously.

"No," she replied, "I was only thinking."

A waiter entered, shuffling his feet discreetly before opening the door. He brought a bottle of wine, bread, plates and eating utensils, vanishing noiselessly, to reenter, a moment later, with two bowls of soup. Once Larini entered to inquire if the signor was well served and if the wine was not rare. It was good red wine of the Pyrenees such as one did not serve to the rabble; only to the high-born who honored his poor establishment. The Amontillado would come later. This was good wine, but the Amontillado! Ah, that was precious as drops of blood! It was the wine of life. The signor would see.

To Mrs. Carol the dinner at Larini's will always be remembered as a period of the most intense emotional strain that ever come into her life. The forepart of the meal was silent. She drank little of the Chianti. Bayden drank much, and with each glass his eyes grew brighter. Whenever Mrs. Carol met them she shrank. Everything seemed still with the awful calm of an impending storm. Conversational sallies, made by one and then the other, ended in monosyllabic replies.

In due time Larini, himself, served the Amontillado. He uncorked it in silent reverence, as though it were a religious rite, and withdrew, after filling the glasses.

The first glass acted as a tonic to Mrs. Carol's overwrought nerves. She drained the glass quickly and the glow of a new strength and confidence permeated her every vein. She raised her head and looked Bayden straight in the eyes. It was like the meeting of flint and steel.

"What did you bring me here for?" she asked, finally.

Both seemed to have forgotten that it was her own request. Bayden reached out his hand and caught her about the wrist. She remained passive but her eyes still held his.

"Don't—you—know?" said Bayden, slowly. Each word was vibrant with repressed emotion. "Don't—you—know? I love you."

He caught the wrist of her free hand, as she raised it, protestingly, imprisoning both in the clasp of his one. He arose and leaned across the table toward her.

"Don't cry out," he said softly, as he saw the sudden terror of her face. His eyes were close to hers and some hypnotic quality in them held her still. For a moment he gazed at her fixedly. She could feel the warmth of his breath upon her lips.

Suddenly he released her hands. They fell listlessly at her sides. Her whole body relaxed as if from great muscular exhaustion.

"There," he said, "you are free. You can go if you wish. There is a bell at your elbow—to summon assistance."

He reseated himself. She regarded him half-fearfully, but with yearning.

"You are free," he said again. "Aren't you angry? Don't you want to go?"

"No," said Mrs. Carol, faintly. She stretched her arms across the table and caught the sleeve of his coat. "No," she repeated; "I want to stay—with you—forever."

"Ah," exclaimed Bayden. He was smiling a little. "And—Dick?"

"I love you," was all she said.

This time Bayden laughed.

"You are all alike, you women," he said, "all alike. Why do you play with fire and think you are strong? Don't you know that, in the end, you are bound to get the worst of it? All men are not fools—and some of them can act—as well as you. And always, under the laws of the land, they have the best of the deal."

Mrs. Carol gasped. She tried to utter some reply—some question, perhaps—but her tongue refused to act.

"You thought me a boy, didn't you?" Bayden went on. "You thought I would amuse you for an interval. After that, you had Dick—and you didn't care. You used the same methods that all other women use—the old, obvious methods—and you thought I couldn't see.

"Well, I accepted the challenge. My methods were equally simple. It was hardly worth while to be original—with you. I just played the boy and changed into the man. I first appealed, then perplexed, then mastered you. It was pitiably easy, wasn't it?"

Mrs. Carol's face was absolutely devoid of color. Even her lips went pale as the blood receded after pressure. Only her eyes glowed as they rested upon Bayden's face.

"You—you—" she articulated, shrilly. Her tone indicated a question, but she did not finish. With the wild cry of a beaten child, she bowed her face between her arms upon the tablecloth and sobbed.

Bayden watched her, impassively, for a moment. Then he came to her side and raised her gently by the shoulders.

"It might have been much worse," he said, grimly. "I might not have been quite so—honorable, if you will permit the expression. As it is you have had a lesson and it has cost you nothing but your pride. Come, we will go now."

She followed him submissively. A cab, previously ordered by Bayden, awaited them. Neither spoke until they reached her hotel. As they parted, she stretched out her arms to him, mutely.

"No," he said, sternly, "remember Dick"—with which he re-entered the cab.

* * * * * * *

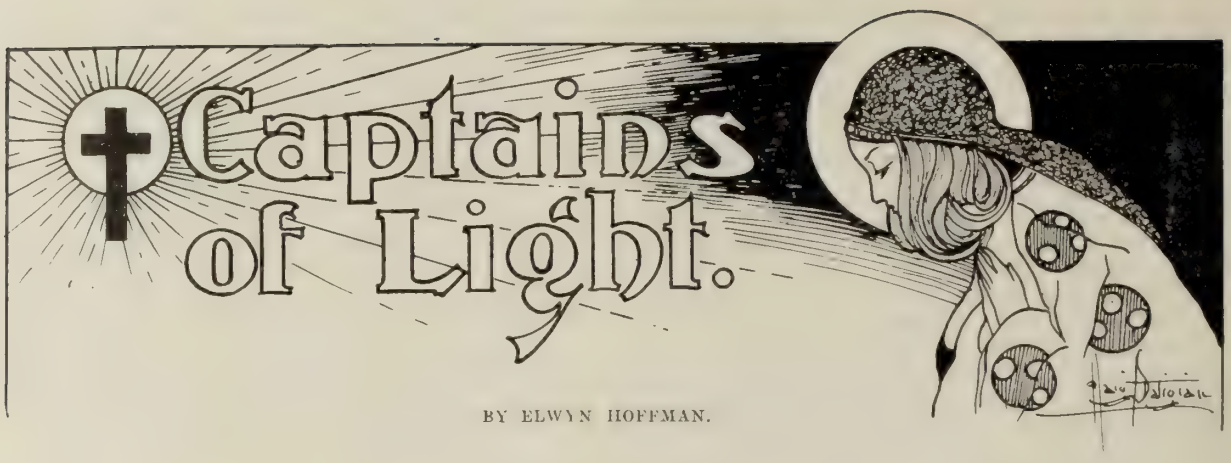
Mrs. Carol ascended, hurriedly, to her room. Arrived there, she threw herself, hat and all, upon the bed. At first she pummeled the pillows with her small gloved fists and bit the sleeve of her dress in convulsive rage. Later she wept.

After a time the storm ceased. She arose, lighted the gas, surveyed herself in the mirror—and shuddered. Then she re-arranged her hair and carefully removed the marks of her recent emotion.

"After all, I have Dick," she said to herself.

And she wrote him an affectionate letter.

In Absence



BY LOUIS A. ROBERTSON.

These dreary days, how dark they seeem,
  But from their gloom I often stray
To greet thee in a glorious dream.
These dreary days, how dark they seem,
But through the clouds there bursts a beam—
  Prophetic of a brighter day.
These dreary days, how dark they seem,
  But from their gloom I often stray.

When thou wert by my side the hours
  Were lit with Love's enrapturing light.
Though dark are these abandoned bowers,
When thou wert by my side the hours
Crowned me with Love's unfading flowers
  That separation cannot blight.
When thou wert by my side the hours
  Were lit with Love's enrapturing light.

Soon there will dawn a day when we
  Shall meet again, no more to part.
I dream of all the bliss to be.
Soon there will dawn a day when we
In one another's eyes shall see
  The love now hidden in each heart.
Soon there will dawn a day when we
  Shall meet again, no more to part.

Our souls shall then together blend,
  Yea, even now I speed through space;
On Love's swift wings to thee I wend,
Our souls shall then together blend,
And thou unto my heart shall lend
  The rapture of thy blest embrace.
Our souls shall then together blend,
  Yea, even now I speed through space.

BY ELWYN HOFFMAN.

The bells ring in the Christmas day.
And Christ is born. Tomorrow? Lo!
The cross shall show Him crucified
Upon the Calvary of Greed!
How slowly do we learn—how long
It takes to drive the lesson home.
How many Christs must teach and die
Before our selfish hearts give in Unto Christ-love! How many Romes
Must spread their curses ere we know
The curse of Rome. How many times
Must voice of counsel speak its word
Ere we attend, and shape our ways
With understanding! Pain, and death,
And wreck, and ruin, and despair,
Extortion, slavery and lust—
The dark superlatives of woe—
Must be our portion ere we reach
The minimum of gain. Long years
And longer centuries pass by
Each with its lesson still unlearned,
Engulfing, in the deeps of Time,
Captains of Light who led and lost
Deserted in their hour of need!

O Captains! Yet arise and lead
And bear the banner up the height,
And wave the torch, and speak great words—
Of love and hope to lift the weak
And humble greed, and chasten pride!
Lead on! Lead on! And earth at last
Will ring in truth a chime of joy
For Christ, the Captain, Christ, the King,
And Love, the Master of the World!

The Joys of Christmas

This is the season of the year when we feel that it behooves us to regard our burdens and cares philosophically, and to cultivate an altruistic attitude toward our fellows. Nobody is quite insensible to the subtle influences of this time of home cheer and universal peace and good will toward man. Those who are too unfortunate to enter into the spirit of the time are bowed down by melancholy, accentuated by contrasting their misery with the happiness of others; the pessimism of the pessimistic is intensified, and the exuberance of the cheerful and contented becomes more pronounced. There is no time in life when joy and despair are on such intimate terms as at this modern Yuletide of ours. Yet by all the precepts we are taught to revere this as the one time of year when they should be divorced. But for many this "Merry Christmas" of a mercenary age is a horrid mockery. The almighty dollar, symbolical of all that was most despised by the Founder of Christianity, exercises a tremendous influence at this time of year. If the dollar is yours, why then you are merry; if you have it not, you are in misery, and your unhappiness is accentuated by the joy around you. But Christmas is the feast of childhood, and poor indeed is the child who is not gladdened by the glorious anniversary. As for the adult, it is difficult for him to shut out the Christmas spirit, for it is infectious. It is a generous spirit that causes us to be animated with a charitable sentiment towards all our fellows. It is the spirit that Christ came on earth to inculcate, and which is the inheritance of man handed down through the ages from father to son. How far more pleasant as a place of residence would this mundane sphere be if a little of that spirit which animated Him who never spoke in scorn of others, and was never wrathful save against those who defiled the temple by their greed of gold, were spread through all our years to chasten us and make us better men and better citizens of our country! Christmas comes to us hallowed because we feel the sacredness of the season set apart to celebrate the birth of the Babe in the Manger, and because it is an anniversary around which cluster the early and sweet recollections of childish joys, and of associations of the blissful days agone. But as the years roll on, our Christmas joy is very apt to proceed from considerations of a material character. If we are content it is because we are prosperous. If we are cheerfully hopeful it is because we expect the propitious fruition of our plans. The world has a vast and legitimate appetite for prosperity. Wealth is a power for good as well as for evil. It promotes general happiness and makes charity possible. At present prosperity is diffused so that its benefits are very widely shared, though many of us feel that a much more equitable distribution could be made. The millennium is as yet remote, and God has not ordained that all his creatures should share and share alike. There must be some stimulus to industry in all the walks of life, and general satisfaction with the distribution of wealth would result disastrously if it could continue long enough. However, there is occasion for general rejoicing over the increase of wealth and the facilities for developing the resources of the earth. It is perhaps unfortunate that all are not content, that the workingmen of the country are inclined to stop the wheels of progress, but they are entitled to felicitation on having secured many concessions during the past year to which they were entitled, and all of us should rejoice in the growing appreciation of the closeness of the bond by which all sorts and conditions of men are held together.

A Courteous Concert Suggested

Since the marriage of Mrs. Kemp and the scandal that attended it, an effort has been made to bring about a "courteous" concert of action by the Protestant churches regarding the religious marriage of people who have been divorced. Archbishop Farley was asked to join in a conference of Protestant ministers to bring about an agreement of courtesy among them to refuse to remarry divorced people after any other minister had declined to perform the ceremony. His refusal was not only justifiable, but obligatory. The Catholic Church is distinguished from all Protestantism in making matrimony a sacrament, dissoluble for no cause whatever. Archbishop Farley could therefore not be expected to approve a policy of expediency regarding it. All the churches of Protestantism reject the sacramental character of matrimony and are therefore indirectly responsible for divorce and its consequences. Something more than a courteous concert of action on the part of the ministry is required to improve the respect of people for the marital relation and to promote intolerance of promiscuous affections. Some of the Catholic women of New York are talking of banding together and visiting the penalty of social ostracism on those of their sex who have been excommunicated for remarrying, but such a movement would not meet with much favor or amount to much practically. While the laws of the State sanction divorce, it will be vain for people to assume the right to proscribe those who exercise the privileges of citizenship. Moreover it would be fatuously presumptuous. In New York society it would be ridiculous, for all of the "best" people have passed through the divorce mill. At the Hunnewell wedding nine out of the twelve people present had been divorced. Not until there is a radical revolution in the religious sentiment of the people will there be any possibility of a change in public sentiment which would lead to a higher regard for the sanctity of marriage and the abolition of divorce.

No Dispensation for Her

The marriage of Mrs. Kemp to Mr. Hollis H. Hunnewell in New York has provoked discussion of the probability of the former's obtaining a dispensation from Rome entitling her to the solemnization of the union by a priest of the Church. There is always talk of a dispensation when a prominent Catholic who has been divorced contracts a second marriage, but the inexorable rule of the Catholic Church is to refuse to sanction a second marriage unless it can be shown that the first, by reason of certain impediments expressed by the laws of the Church, should be annulled. The impediments for which a first marriage may be annulled as void, and a second performed in accordance with church ceremony are thus summarized by Father Coppen, the famous Jesuit theologian:

First—The impediment of mistaken identity; when one of the contracting parties is not the person whom the other intended to marry.

Second—The impediment of impotency.

Third—the impediment of blood relationship, or consanguinity, invalidates marriage between parents and their children, ancestors and their descendants; also, collaterally, between descendants from the same stock down to the fourth degree included.

Fourth—The impediment of insufficient age invalidates matrimony when entered into by a boy who has not completed his fourteenth year, or a girl who has not completed her twelfth year.

Fifth—The impediment of disparity of worship exists when a baptized person attempts to marry one not baptized. This impediment annuls the contract.

Sixth—The impediment of spiritual relationship is established by the Church between sponsors and godchild in baptism and confirmation; between the sponsors and the parents of the godchild, as also between the person baptizing and the one baptized and his parents.

Seventh—The impediment of fear or violence arises when strong fear or compulsion is unjustly used to induce a person to contract a certain marriage.

Eighth—The impediment of insanity exists when one of the contracting parties is proved to have been of unsound mind at the time of the contract.

Accused of Heresy

A Methodist Minister connected with the faculty of the Boston University has been summoned to trial for heresy. It is charged that his views concerning the Deity, the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures and the Atonement are contrary to the teachings of the Scriptures and of the established doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A trial for heresy is an unusual proceeding in the dawn of the twentieth century. The "new theology" is so uncertain that it has become a matter of speculation as to what is the orthodoxy of any particular sect. Such rapid changes are the theologians making nowadays, in their views, that it is decidedly difficult to follow them. Various are the interpretations of the dogma of the Atonement, and very few advanced ministers agree about the authority of the Holy Scriptures. The Boston minister is an up-to-date clergyman who has kept pace with the march of progress in religious circles, and he should have no difficulty in disproving the charges of heresy in the light of the new theology.

The Native Taking to the Navy

From the annual report of Secretary Moody it appears that the foreign element in our naval forces is growing less every year. This element formerly constituted a large percentage of the personnel of the navy. There are opportunities for heroic deeds in the navy even in times of peace, and there is some satisfaction in knowing, while enthusing over a performance of the heroic kind, that the performer was a full-blood American. Indeed, it is rather a shock to our patriotism when we learn, after glorifying the hero of a thrilling achievement, that he was born in a foreign land and was not even a naturalized citizen. Boatswain Deery, who was commended by his commander the other day, for bravery, and who will be voted a medal of honor by Congress, is of the stuff out of which heroes are fashioned, and he is native born. He it was who carried a hawser to the torpedo boat Adder when she was foundering in a terrific gale and raging sea. He swam one hundred yards, carrying the hawser after him through the icy waters. The latest report of the Secretary of the Navy shows that there are now in the service twenty-seven thousand two hundred and forty-five landsmen and apprentices. Of this number 79.8 per cent are native born, and 10.9 per cent naturalized citizens. Among the landsmen for training the percentage of native born citizens is 93. This showing is better than that of any previous year and compares favorably with that of many European nations.

A National Theatre Projected

The Hon. Robert Walter Miers, Congressman from somewhere in Indiana, has a mission. It is to educate the people, and he thinks the best medium of education is a National Theatre situated not in Indiana, but in Washington, D. C. He has therefore introduced a bill in Congress providing for the appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building. In his perambulatory utterances he sets forth that "all hopes of human happiness" depend upon "the fullest development of knowledge," and he makes it "a conscientious duty" to employ "all means of education," for "the relief and succor of the human race." The expediency of a National Theatre has long been urged by struggling playwrights who find it impossible to persuade a manager to produce the products of their genius. The Hon. Robert Walter Miers of Indiana wishes to achieve fame and insure the perpetuation of his memory by becoming the patron saint of the unappreciated dramatic genius. There is no danger of education slumping in this university-ridden country through the need of a National Theatre, but if the Miers bill goes through, the writers of impossible plays will receive great encouragement, for they will be given a hearing. One of the purposes of the author of the theatre bill is "to exploit contemporaneous questions of vital concern to the day in which they occur." Aren't those questions sufficiently exploited already by the Weberfieldian exponents of the lighter form of drama? And wouldn't Congress object to having itself dramatized in a way calculated to evoke spirited hissing? Most of the contemporaneous questions of vital interest arise in Congress, and if they were to be dramatized the Government censor would no doubt discourage a great deal of genius.

The Latest School Fad

ise of some amelioration of that infliction, teachers began to draw a long breath, but the free respiration turns out to be premature. After all, it is a case of enduring evils they have rather than flying to new ones which they have not sampled. The very latest and newest fad, "compiled and copyrighted by a graduate of the training school for nurses, New York Hospital," is to be taught in every grade, from the highest to the lowest. The babies, who can hardly find their way from their mother's door to the schoolhouse, are to be put through a course of emergency rules embracing the treatment of hemorrhages, lacerated wounds, broken legs and arms, dislocations, sprains, burns and scalds, sunstroke, heat exhaustion, epileptic fits, apoplexy, fainting, stunning or concussion of the brain, infantile convulsions, poisons, poisoning from decayed meat and fish, bites of animals and insects, croup, choking, suffocation, foreign bodies in eyes, nostrils and ears, toothache, faceache, earache, drowning accidents, colds and frost bite. Children who can hardly manage to carry two books half a block without dropping one are to be taught to make stretchers of window shutters. They are to make the acquaintance of iodoform, gauze, compresses, splints and syringes, to distinguish between sprains and dislocations, heat prostration and apoplexy, and to be familiar with the symptoms of poisoning from alcohol, belladonna, digitalis, aconite, opium, arsenic and various acids. Ipecac is to be as familiar as peppermint candy, and styptic cotton and sterilized linen as easy to handle as shoestrings. A large part of the medical practice of today is the outcome of people's attempts to save doctor bills, and such cases will increase a hundred fold when the children are entrusted with the care of the family health. At present this treatise on professional nursing is in the hands of the teachers, and the poor little victims are expected to transcribe their daily lesson in the inevitable blank book, but in the course of a week or two there will be apt to appear an illustrated primary text-book which will be added to the list, and the next step will, of course, be some young doctor with a pull, who will obtain a fat-salaried sinecure for reporting the teachers as incompetent because they are not all graduated and certificated physicians.

An Absurd Suggestion

A few years ago one of the new school of educators put himself on record by calling attention to the advantages of hypnotism in the training of children. He advocated its use in every apparent emergency and urged parents to learn how to influence their children in order to cure thumb-sucking, nail-biting, left-handedness, disobedience, impertinence, and all the real and imaginary vexations which a child might voluntarily or involuntarily cause its guardians. Like all new-school theorists he deprecated the use of the rod and regarded an application of bitter aloes or a woolen mitten as too great an indignity to be imposed upon little fingers that would stray to lips. Now comes another, in a magazine article, in which he urges trained nurses to learn hypnotism and recommends it to cure nightmare, correct defective memory and save children from effort and their elders from the trouble of training them by slow stages. In plain words, it will be easier to gain control over a child's will through hypnotic suggestion, while it is too young to understand and resist, than it will be to train that will and teach the little ones self-control. They are to be turned into automata—machines to do the bidding of others without the capacity of initiative, practically reduced to a state of feeble-mindedness and idiocy, and perhaps eventually to help fill asylums or penitentiaries. It is a deplorable truth that the modern child is untrained, but we do not know that he is intractable. It is not that he will not do what he is told, but that he is not made to do it. He does not obey because he does not have to. Experience has taught him that if he does not give in, his parents will, or if they do not, some busybody neighbor will invoke the offices of "the cruelty man" in his behalf. He does not learn his lessons unless he pleases because he knows that his lack of progress will be counted against his teacher and not against himself. He commands where his father and mother were commanded, not because he is so different from what they were but because they differ from their parents. What were once regarded as juvenile crimes and punished accordingly are now regarded as amusing stunts and laughed at. No doubt corporal punishment was overdone in its day but its abolishment has resulted in more harm than good. We have seen one generation raised without a court of final appeal and we have the results before us. All over the country we find judges who have dealings with juvenile law breakers recommending a return to primitive methods, and only a week or two ago a little girl of nine was sentenced to a good spanking which her father duly administered. Eastern principals are demanding a return to the rod and it is generally conceded that milk and water methods have proved a failure. Children have had too much liberty. They have exercised their own wills to the limit, but of choice between two evils that is a less dangerous condition than depriving them of will power altogether and leaving them open to every evil suggestion. We know too little about hypnotism, what it is and what are its effects, to permit any one and every one to take a hand at it. There is too much of such power exercised now, for whether all who claim to be under its influence really are so or whether they only imagine it, the effect is the same. Hypnotic power when exercised by the wrong agent is as dangerous as dynamite in the hands of an anarchist. Instead of requiring children blindly to surrender their wills, they should be taught to use them. Any one who has ever dealt with children knows that though the ones with independent wills are hard to "manage" they are more to be admired than the little jellyfish who are apt to be so good as to be good for nothing.

Christ is born today. Sad heart
Look up, and hope.
Those who kneel and still their cries
Do not know that in His eyes
Shadow of a cross there lies.

Love is born today. My heart

Sweet content is all about;
But the life blood will drip out,
Some day, on a cross of doubt.

The Year in Society

The year in society has been a spectacular one on this side of the continent as well as on the Atlantic coast. The country has enjoyed an unprecedented era of prosperity, and as a consequence money has been spent lavishly for social pleasures. There has been the usual number of surprises in engagements and in broken engagements, and there have been some tragedy, a great deal of the dramatic element and no end of frivolity. The climbers have climbed a little higher and a few more representatives of San Francisco's smart set have reached the goal of their ambition by breaking into the Holy of Holies at Newport. By reason of new marital connections we are becoming more intimately related to the 400 of New York every year, and we find ourselves taking as deep an interest in the doings of the aristocrats of the East as though we were of them. Moreover we are adopting their manners and customs in all things, including divorce. If we continue at the rate we have been going it will require an effort of memory, after awhile, to recall who was who's wife or husband last year, for lightning changes are threatening to become fashionable, I hear. To re-marry before the ink signing the decree is dry is now the very acme of smartness, and there have been instances in the East of the enjoyment of funeral baked meats by bridal parties. Indignant protests against the frivolities, the extravagances and the indecencies of society continue to emanate from the pulpit for the ministry is hopelessly old-fashioned in everything except theology. The censorious critics are watching with amazement the building up of colossal fortunes to which even Croesus was a stranger and the concomitant extravagances and frivolities, and they are alarmed. But if they were more ardent students of history they would know that in all periods of great prosperity there has been much expenditure in the pursuit of pleasure. American society is having its fling and its dissipations are spectacular. It is by his dollars that the aristocrat's influence in society is measured, and he is not hiding them. He is the effervescent product of a new world, and he has no traditions to guide or restrain him, but in time he will learn repose.

Gossip of the Cycle

The unexpected did not happen in nineteen hundred and three. Jimmy Phelan and Dr. Harry Tevis are as far from the hymeneal altar as ever. Mr. Phelan has been reported engaged at various times to Mrs. Cook-Martin, Miss McKenna and Zelie de Lussan, and Dr. Tevis has been reported the fiance of Lily Lawlor, but neither gentleman has ever intimated that he contemplated giving a farewell bachelor dinner. The most sensational event of the year was the marriage of William Randolph Hearst, and the most surprising was that of Truxtun Beale and Marie Oge. The elopement of Daisy Parrott and Parker Whitney caused quite a flutter, principally because of the hysterical opposition of the bride's mother. Another marriage of interest was that of Gladys Crocker with Powers Gouraud; the brother of her mother's third husband. The Jarboe divorce supplied gossip for the tabbies, as also did that of the La Montagnes and the subsequent marriage of Mrs. La Montagne with Mr. Maud.

Cupid's Activity

There was quite an epidemic of engagements during the year, and nearly all terminated in marriages during the twelvemonth. It may be of interest to recall that these were the engagements of note during the year: Edith Findley and George Gardener; Ermine Louise Thompson and Samuel Mountford Wilson; Genevieve Carolan and Harry Poett; Viola Piercy and Mr. Burnett; Mabel Hopkins and Charlie Quinn; Georgia Sullivan and Louis Wright of Washington, D. C.; Ethel Tobin and Aloysius Welch; Marian Holden and Charles Pope; Olive Holbrook and Silas Palmer; Kate Gunn and C. M. Woods; Mrs. Minetta Chesson and Henry C. Cutting, the Tonopah magnate; Louise Hoffacker and Charles Page; Miss Dibble and Nat Messer Jr.; Edith McBean and Dr. Kierstedt; Alene Ford and Lewis Pierce; Florence Josselyn and Henry McDonald Spencer; Miss Andrew and Pedar Bruguiere; Edith Newlands and Charles Johnson of Washington, D. C.; Theodosia Cook Martin and Frank Grace; Miss Collier and Reginald Norris; Susanne Hayes and Rev. Burr Weedon; Dorothy Heynemann and Leon Greenbaum; Mrs. Genevieve Green Hamilton and Garret W. ney; Julia de Laveaga and Andrew Welch; Kate Clement and Dixwell Hewitt; Carrie Taylor and George Newhall; Janet Bruce and Rev. Clifford Macon; Bertie Bruce and Mr. Stephenson; Alanna Marmion and Joseph O'Sullivan, in Paris; Therese Morgan and Norris Davis; Gladys Merrill and Harry Bates; Anne Apperson and Dr. Flint; Fanny Loughborough and Allan Wallace; Eloise Davis and Wallace Everett; Mary Nichols and Philip Lansdale; Mary Kip and Dr. Robinson; Bernie Drown and Sam Boardman; Vesta Shortridge and Emile Bruguiere. Of these all but a few have married. There is considerable difference of opinion concerning the last mentioned, as to whether it is off or on. Some people are of the opinion that it is off and that Miss Shortridge will wed Charles Rollo Peters. Another engagement reported but of which no one is quite sure is that of Bessie Ames and "Bobby" Eyre, which has been hanging fire for a year or more. Ernest Wiltsee was several times reported the accepted fiancee of the young widow, Cornelia Baxter Tevis, but the latest report couples her name with a New York bachelor, Mr. Peters. Helen De Young has been betrothed by the bavardes to the youngest Tobin more than once, and Lurline Spreckels was in the same way made the fiance of respectively a French marquis, Mr. Skipwith of the Marblehead and George de Long. Helen Wagner has several times had her name coupled with that of young Howard Huntington. When Helen Dean decided to go abroad for an extended stay it was expected she would announce her engagement with either Frank King or Baldwin Wood, but she did not. Nor has Susie Blanding yet said positively that she and Knox Maddox are betrothed. And Katherine Dillon absolutely refuses to say whether the naval officer or Fred Greenwood has won her heart.

Simple Senator Bard

The question that has been puzzling the politicians of late is whether Senator Bard is a man with a very fine quality of conscience or merely a poseur. If not the latter, then he is the most unsophisticated statesman that ever represented this State in Washington. I am inclined to the opinion that he has high ideals, and that his morals are all right, but that he is suffering from an incurable case of myopia. His candidate for Naval Officer, Bill Cutter of Yuba, is not the only politician with a tattooed reputation whose cause he has espoused. He urged the appointment of "sad-eyed" Steve Kelly to the office of Internal Revenue Collector, and they say that if "Chris" Buckley were a Republican, Bard would back him for Superintendent of the Mint. The Senator is a fine illustration of the futility of honesty in office when it is combined with stupendous simplicity. It is a theory of some philosophers that a smart crook in office is far less dangerous than an incorruptible damphool.

He Was Born Lucky

So hopelessly homespun is the simplicity of the junior Senator from California, that he is actually laboring under the delusion at this moment that he was called to the national halls of legislation by the voice of the people. Yet, at the time of his election he wasn't known by reputation to over one thousand people in the State. Even the dogs in the street at Sacramento knew that Bard was put into the fight by the enemies of Dan Burns. They selected Bard to do the trick because, being unknown, he had no enemies to oppose him. He didn't have to pay a cent for his election, but thousands of dollars were spent in his behalf by the anti-Burns men. His election was a freakish whim of Dame Fortune. Some men are born lucky and Bard is one of them. He came to this coast in the late seventies as the representative of Tom Scott, in the role of advance agent for the Texas-Pacific. He bought terminal facilities for the company, and incidentally made some purchases in his own behalf. The surrounding country enjoyed a spurt of prosperity some years later and Bard found himself a rich man.

He's So Conscientious

As a representative of this State in Washington Bard is a dismal failure. He doesn't do much more than draw his salary and look wise. But no Spartan patriot was ever more conscientious. Indeed this trait was responsible for his undoing in the field of statecraft. And thereby hangs a tale. Shortly after the debut of Bard in the Senate he was approached one day by Senator Hanna, who told him that a certain bill was an Administration measure and that he would be expected to vote for it. Now it is customary for the Senators of the party represented by the President to support all bills which the Administration leader designates as Administration measures, and which involve no political issue upon which there is any party division. Hanna explained that the bill which he desired Bard to vote for was of that nature.

"But," said Bard, "I haven't read it."

Hanna briefly told him what the bill was and of the custom of the Senate.

"I don't doubt your word," said Bard, "but I couldn't vote for a bill that I hadn't read."

"Oh, very well," said Hanna, "I'm afraid that if you're going to read the ten or twelve thousand bills of that nature that come up during the session you won't have any time for committee work."

Since then no attempt has been made to trespass on the time Bard desires to put in in the conscientious performance of his duty. And nobody pays any attention to him.

That Bogus Telegram

Now that Montague is no longer postmaster, the politicians are anxious to know how long Assistant Postmaster McKinley will hold his job. President McKinley was a nephew of our Assistant Postmaster, and during the former's life his uncle's pull was quite potent. The story of his appointment is an amusing one. He became an aspirant for the position shortly after Montague's appointment, but the latter was partial to D. S. Richardson, who was one of the aspirants for the job. However Montague was reluctant to turn down the President's uncle and he held the matter in abeyance until one day he received a telegram from Washington containing merely this query:

Engraved Wedding Announcements and Invitations

ROBERTSON, 126 Post Street San Francisco

Heergaard — Scientific Palmist at 242 Post — readings daily and at society functions telephone James 1

"Why has my uncle not been appointed Assistant Postmaster? Wm. McKinley."

Montague sent for Uncle Mac instanter and said, "It gives me great pleasure to inform you that I have appointed you to the position of Assistant Postmaster." Then he wired the President that his wishes had been obeyed; that his uncle had been appointed. Several days later he received a letter from the President saying he was pleased with the appointment, but that he did not recall having expressed any wishes regarding it. It was learned that the telegram was bogus but nobody ever found out who sent it.

Roosevelt Borrowed From Folk

The deadly parallel has been invoked to convict President Roosevelt of plagiarism. There is a preponderance of evidence so overwhelming that there can be no escape. In that part of his Message relating to the necessity for legislation to secure extradition for bribery, he avails himself not only of the thought and the ideas of Circuit-Attorney Folk of St. Louis, who has convicted some fifteen Missourian boodlers and politicians of the offense, but he has also borrowed a great deal of the exact language used by Mr. Folk in his speeches. But the discovery is of no great importance. The President isn't expected to embody none but his own thoughts in his Message, and in borrowing those of others it is natural for him to use a little of the language in which they are clothed, especially if the style is suitable for his purpose. We know that Roosevelt is not only a thinker but also a capable and fluent writer; that he doesn't have to depend on any one to do either his thinking or his writing. But he is a very busy man, and nobody should object to his availing himself of the sound views of a contemporary official to get material for one chapter of a twelve-thousand-word state paper.

"If I don't see you before 1904," said Cynicus to Miss Bachelor Maid, "let me wish for you that you will get what you most desire."

"I don't think I shall get that," returned Miss Bachelor Maid, "it is an impossibility."

"Oh, no, don't be disheartened—isn't 1904 Leap Year?"

Cannon Wouldn't Be Bluffed

Congressman Livernash is unfortunate not only in being temperamentally imprudent, but also in having indiscreet friends. Last week Mr. H. J. Schultheis, the legislative agent of union labor interests in Washington, called on Speaker Cannon and asked that Livernash be appointed chairman of the Committee on Labor. Mr. Cannon explained that as Livernash occupied the seat of a former Republican and as his election was being contested his status was such that he had no claims at all on the considerations of the Speaker for such an important place. Thereupon Mr. Schultheis attempted to bluff Mr. Cannon and he became so insulting that the latter ejected him from the Speaker's room. This sort of tactless conduct is not going to help Livernash in the contest for his seat. However, it appears that the Congressman and his friends imagine that the Republican party will be afraid to unseat a representative of labor on the eve of a presidential election. But I think it all depends on what sort of showing Julius Kahn is able to make. It is evident, at any rate, that the labor representatives cannot browbeat Speaker Cannon.

"Who was the most popular woman at the Christmas Eve ball?"

"My chaperon," answered Baby Bud, "she had all her dances three-deep, and more supper invitations than any girl in the ballroom."

Pictures That Were Not Hung

A most amusing incident occurred at the recent Bohemian Club Art Exhibition. Jack Wilson had given two commissions to different artists—one for for a redwood picture in panels and one for a Yosemite—and when the pictures arrived neither was considered good enough to hang by the hanging committee—not even if they hanged for it. When the pictures were all up Mr. Wilson came down to see them and instantly looked for the two that were his property. They were not there. He flew to the hanging committee and demanded to know where they were, for he had helped to unpack them himself. When the sad truth was borne home to him, he stormed about the jinks room. "Most embarrassing, most embarrassing," he blustered. "Here I've invited some ladies to come down and inspect these pictures. I'll have to make up some fairy tale to tell 'em." The committee remained obdurate and the pictures were not hung. The ladies came and the explanation seemed to be satisfactory, for every one appeared to be having a good time. Comparatively few pictures were sold at the exhibition this year for the reason that the artists valued them too highly. Latimer sold all of his, which he richly deserved to do, for all were good and the prices were within reason. It seems strange that as soon as an artist has a little success he should immediately consider himself a great master and raise his prices so that they are out of reach of all but the very rich.

Lazy Orrin Peck

The most interesting pictures in the Bohemian Club exhibition are the portraits by Orrin Peck, but that lazy genius had not finished a single one of them and in each there remains something essential to do. The portrait of Mrs. Hearst is a small and old one, but it has Mr. Peck's trick of catching a marvelous likeness. He is certainly most clever in this regard. The portrait of the lady in white—a Washington woman—is the most striking thing in the room. It teems with life and is excellently posed and painted. The portrait of Charles Wheeler is equally well done. It is Mr. Wheeler to the life, beaming upon you from the canvas, with that all-things-to-all-men manner that distinguishes that gentleman. Mr. Peck leaves for Europe very soon. Away from the attractions of San Francisco, which have proved too much for his industry, and immersed once more in the atmosphere of paint and painters, the talented fellow will probably settle down to work again. It is hard to keep him away from the bon vivants. Peck and Joullin were to have gone together but Amadee became tired of waiting, and so Peck urged him to go on and he would follow and join him in New York. Joullin is still waiting in New York; Mr. Peck has not yet been able to say good-bye to all his favorite restaurants.

A Find in a Saloon

Curator Martin of the Mark Hopkins Art Institute is rejoicing over the find of a rare picture of the Dutch school which has just been cleaned and restored by Arthur Mathews and hung in the little office of the Art Institute. The picture is unsigned but bears internal evidence that it is of the Dutch school in its most palmy period. It is a Susannah at the bath and the model who posed for it is the same woman who posed for Rubens's Susannah. The figure is not posed in the same way but it is painted with all the strength of Rubens and with the same vivid coloring of drapery and flesh. When Mr. Martin first saw the picture it was in a saloon and was so black with dirt and so grimy from ill use that only the Susannah could be seen. Since cleaning, another figure in the background, of equal strength and power, has been revealed. What first attracted Mr. Martin's notice was the beauty of the antique frame, for which he really bought the picture. Since then he has been able to trace the picture in so far that he has discovered that it was brought to this country by a rich French family by way of New Orleans, and that when they became impoverished it found its way to this coast. Experts pronounce it a much better picture than some of those which masquerade as Rubens's in local galleries.

Jones—I'll bet Smith buys his wife something expensive for Christmas.

Brown—Why do you think so?

Jones—She saw him coming out of the elevator of a French restaurant last week.

Where There Is No Vulgar Display

Miss Anna Louise Daniells is back in Alameda after an absence of nineteen months, spent in study with the best vocal teachers in Germany. During her residence abroad her headquarters were at Cassel, the home of Madame Wagner, whose interest in the lovely Californian is one of the pleasantest memories of the foreign tour. When the steamer Neckar, on which Miss Daniells was a passenger from Bremer-haven, docked at Hoboken, Mr. and Mrs. D. F. Verdenal met her and she was their guest four days, in their handsome home in West Seventy-fifth street, New York. After a brief visit with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. T. G. Daniells, the ambitious young woman will return to Germany. She is enraptured with the life abroad, where, she says, "there is no vulgar display, no bustle or haste, but where work is art and art is loved for its own sake. Symphony concerts," she adds, "begin at six and end at ten o'clock at night, and are often given out of doors, a woman going, if she chooses to do so, in her cotton waist. There every one knows good music; every one demands it and therefore it is always of the best. Oh! we are years behind Germany in music and art. Over there, they credit Californians with the best voices. In Germany it is believed that we have a marvelous climate for the voice. They believe climate has to do with the vocal chords."

Miss Isabelle McCurrie, also of Alameda, whose father is a well-known composer of children's songs, and who went to Germany with Miss Daniells to study vocal methods and was with her during the year and a half of foreign study, is at present in Stearns University, Berlin, working like a galley slave at vocal exercises.

Local Musical Culture

In this city society thinks that it is doing a great deal for musical culture through the medium of the Twentieth Century Club. At a recent concert under the auspices of this fashionable club Signor Russo was the star attraction. I have been wondering whether it was thought that he had the ability to supply a few object lessons in the vocal art. Poor Russo had something in the nature of a voice once upon a time, but he was never skilled in the rudiments of the vocal art. But there are many of our musical enthusiasts who affect a superior knowledge of music, who no doubt believe that he is an artist, and evidently some of them are members of the Twentieth Century Club. There are as many quacks among the professional musicians of this city as there are in the medical profession, and they make many people believe in them. A few of them are the pets of society. When we attain a higher degree of musical culture it will probably be understood that there is a vast distinction between a knowledge of music and a knowledge of the vocal art. Some of our most skilled musicians are wofully ignorant of all that pertains to artistic singing, but they manage to convince people that they have attained proficiency in all branches of music.

The Greenway Favorite

Mr. Ned Greenway has been rushing things since his return from his latest trip. Two dances in two weeks is pretty good "going" as they say on the turf, but Ned was always strenuous in the promotion of gayety. Hereafter, by the way, to avoid confusion, his affairs will be known as the Greenway dances. His last dance proved a most delightful affair. There was a large attendance of the men who are regarded as worth while by the match-making mammas, but Greenway always does round up a goodly number of that class, and for that reason his dances are popular. His favorite debutante this year, I hear, is Gertrude Hyde-Smith. He is reputed to be able to make any girl popular, and surely Miss Hyde-Smith was the most popular debutante at his ball last week. However, this petite bud is able to look after her own interests, and she has as many friends among the women as among the men. Her European tour is her staple topic of conversation.

She Likes the Social Whirl

Elizabeth Livermore, who is one of this season's buds, is a Vassar girl. Her social life so far has been far more spectacular than that of her two elder sisters. The Livermores have never cared much for society and they are among the few San Francisco people who have discouraged the advances of the social press agent. Hence there was much surprise when Miss Elizabeth was brought out with a great blare of trumpets. Unlike her sisters she is not fond of the quiet, simple life, and as she is the adored one of the family, it was decided to give her a full measure of the gayety of a San Francisco social season.

Sidney May Take the Helm

There is some speculation in society as to who will take charge of the next Fortnightly in the event of Mrs. Salisbury's illness continuing until the date of that function. Sidney Salisbury is looked upon as the crown prince of the Salisbury dynasty, and it is said that he would like to prove his mettle at the coming cotillion. He inherits a fondness for social life from his mother as well as her gift of repartee. He is a fine-looking youth of the Robinson rather than of the Salisbury type.

Le Mari de Nordica

The news that Madame Nordica desires a divorce from her husband, which was flashed over the wire the other day, is not surprising to those who met Monsieur Doeme—a "Count," I believe he is—when his wife was singing with the Grau company in this city. Doeme is a handsome fellow, and was seen a good deal about the Palace hotel court, but his active part in the Nordica menage appeared to be merely that of soliciting advances on his wife's salary. He was always getting a hundred or so to spend, and his demands must have been a great drain on the prima donna's check-book. Yet Nordica seemed absurdly fond of him in a motherly way, for Doeme is younger than his wife. Theirs was a love match.

The Important Star

The champagne atmosphere of Broadway has proved highly intoxicating to some of our most talented mummers. It affects them with a tipsy exaggeration of their own importance which is quite amusing, especially to the critics of the press who are cynical chaps and disinclined to take the petted darlings of the stage at their own valuation. Even the vivacious comic opera soubrette, whose sense of humor seems so keen when she is earning her salary by entering into the spirit of the libretto, cannot forget her stellar importance off the stage if she has ever had the exquisite pleasure of reading her name in electric lights on Broadway. It is too bad, for the serious air sits unbecomingly on them. Even Lulu Glaser, who was so democratic in the chorus a few years ago, has begun to take herself seriously. Last Tuesday Ashton Stevens called on her, intent on giving her an opportunity to exploit herself for a whole page in the Sunday Examiner. Now that is a privilege which every visiting mummer covets. Even the austere Mrs. "Pat" Campbell grabbed at the opportunity, and if Henry Irving were here he would be delighted to get a whole page of free advertising. Of course the self-satisfied stage people like to appear condescending even when they are inwardly chuckling, for not only is newspaperiety pleasing to their vanity, but it is also highly advantageous from a business standpoint. However Stevens is willing to indulge their conceit, and he doesn't object to their affected condescension, so long as they are polite, but Miss Glaser wasn't that.

The Interview Was Brief

The interview with Miss Glaser was arranged with her manager and press agent on Tuesday morning. They said she had an engagement in half an hour, and wanted to know if he could get sufficient matter for an interview in that time. "Oh, yes," said Stevens, "that's ample time." They accompanied him to her apartments and after the introduction, the manager and press agent proceeded to withdraw.

"I wish you would stay during the interview," said Miss Glaser, "I'm tired of being misrepresented."

Then turning to Mr. Stevens she said, "I have an engagement with one of your dentists in half an hour."

At this moment the Examiner's critic was arising from a chair. "I assure you," he said, "the dentist does not belong to me; also, that I should be delighted not to interview you." Then he bade her good-bye and the incident was closed.

The Examiner will not devote a page to Miss Glaser next Sunday, nor will there be a page reserved for the interview in the Los Angeles Examiner of next Sunday, as originally intended. I believe Miss Glaser is to play in Los Angeles before her return to New York. And yet I've heard that in addition to being one of the brightest lights of the comic opera stage, she was also a clever business woman.

"I never knew Anna had socialistic leanings."

"Well, has she?"

"Watch the mistletoe—if there wasn't an Anna-kissed I lose my bet."

Some Breezy Oakland Gossip

On dit, that handsome Jane Crellin has lost her heart to a Mr. Steckle of Los Angeles, and that, although the engagement has not yet been made known to society in general, the marriage will take place some time about Easter. There is sure to be a gorgeous wedding for the Crellins have one of the most elaborately appointed homes in Oakland, and they like to entertain. Then, they have plenty of money, too, and every one knows that the greater the dash one cuts the surer one is to be sought after, even in ultra-aristocratic circles across the bay. After all, there is no very much more delicate operation than placing a houseful of girls on the market—even if they are rich and endowed with more than the average of good looks. There are still three unmarried daughters in the Crellin home.

A Literary Society Girl

The gossips are again whispering of an engagement soon to be announced between Miss Chrissie Taft and one of her brother Maxwell's closest friends. This is not the first nor the second time that this young lady, who is known among her intimate friends as the "Gibson Girl" of Oakland, has been credited with an affair of the heart that, later, she has denied. Shortly after her return from a fashionable finishing school in the East, she acted as bridesmaid at Miss Annie Clay's wedding—or was it when Jean Hush was married? Anyway, when the bride threw her bouquet to the pretty group of girls at the foot of the stairs it was Miss Taft who caught it. As the significance of the augury flashed across the young woman's mother, who, by the way, looks like a girl herself, she grasped her daughter's hand: "Throw it back, Chrissie, dear. Do," she urged. She did not follow the maternal suggestion, and that may be why the charming Chrissie Taft is still the daughter of the house. However, she has no occasion to worry. A publisher whose word can make or mar a work of fiction declares that no more clever stories have come his way than some little tales submitted by this same "Gibson Girl." And he went further and prophesied for her a brilliant future in the world of literature—that is, if society should pall. Now, is that not an encouraging outlook for a young woman who is supposedly addicted to nothing heavier than the lilt of a love song or the joy of leading a cotillion?

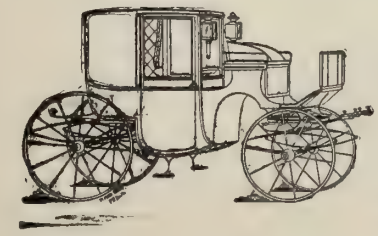
Couldn't Be Suppressed

Mrs. William Keith of Atherton street, Berkeley, wife of the great artist, is one of the most enthusiastic and determined advocates of Equal Suffrage. So full of the subject is she that, no matter what the topic may be, Mrs. Keith finds in it some suggestion of female suffrage. Recently, the artist and his wife were invited to meet a party of eminent New Yorkers, at a dinner given by President and Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler of the University of California. It had been planned that each guest should respond to a toast, and, in speaking of it to Mrs. Keith, Mrs. Wheeler said, frankly: "The only one thing that I want to ask of you is that you will not mention the suffrage question; you know, Mr. Wheeler does not like it."

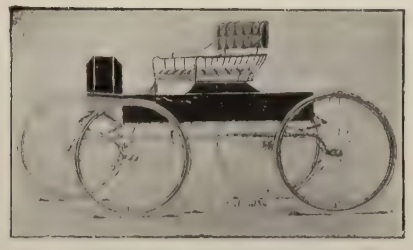
"Give me something, then, that will make it impossible for me to bring in the rights of my sex," suggested Mrs. Keith, with a genial agreement to refrain from forbidden topics.



"Let me see——" mused Mrs. Wheeler. "I'll give you 'Music'—there can be nothing in that to provoke a thought of suffrage."

"Quite true," laughed Mrs. Keith.

This is what the advocate of women's rights said, when she arose to respond to "Music":



"Music is, I think, the most divine of any of the arts. I have been forbidden, my friends, to say anything about Political Equality; our host does not like it, so I was bound down to 'Music.' Now, a great many things may be said concerning music. True, we can get melody from either a bass or a soprano voice, but, if we want the most perfect harmony we must listen to the blended voices of male and female. And it is this that reminds me of suffrage. Speaking of suffrage," etc., etc.

Mr. Keith, by the way, is a great lover of music, and his piano playing has been a trial to the habitues of the Berkeley home, at least to those who had any ear for either harmony or melody, for Mr. Keith does not play as he paints. Not very long ago two or three friends were dining with the artist and his brilliant wife. As the dessert was removed from the table, Mrs. Keith said to her husband: "William, you might go and practice."

"All right," was the ready response, as, with a shake of his shaggy head, he obediently left the room. In a moment the strains of a piano were heard. A silence fell upon the party, then: "That can't be Mr. Keith," cried one of the ladies.

"Why?" queried Mrs. Keith, "don't you like his manner of playing?"

"Yes, it's splendid, but——"

"Mr. Keith is practising faithfully, under my directions and, really, I think he is doing very well," conceded the wife, as the party adjourned to the drawing-room, where, with his back to the door, the big artist sat, intent upon the music he was drawing from a pianola.

Their Pet Charity

If you ever saw charity made the pretext for a society reception it was at the "Fabiola Calendar Tea," which took place at Mrs. Remi Chabot's residence in Oakland on Monday. And now, hearken! Oaklanders are getting a little tired of "Oakland's pet charity," as the society grande dames who are on the hospital board, call it. In speaking of it a prominent grocer remarked the other day, "I was held up for a certain amount of tea and fruit; another merchant was held up for sugar and eggs, and still another for something else. Interest in Fabiola? Good Lord, no. If any of our men or any one belonging to any of us is ill we pay the same as any one else. We simply do not dare refuse the rich women who ask us to turn back to them nearly all the profits of their yearly trade." Well! The tradesman and his donated sugar and tea apart, the affair was a big social success and all the papers said so! Who could expect anything lovelier than the Calendar of quotations edited by society dames? And there was a musical program between three and four o'clock and a dramatic "skit" under the direction of Miss Sevilla Haven. And tea was served by society ladies—"Oakland's most exclusive belles"! Really, if you take everything into consideration, it was cheap—the admission, not the entertainment. And it was a "beautiful Christmas sentiment"—I don't know what, but I heard every one saying so—and what every one says, you know—. Among the ladies who were on the receiving party were Mrs. John Yule, Mrs. Remi Chabot, Mrs. George Wheaton, Mrs. Paul Lohse, Mrs. Thomas Crellin, Mrs. Henry Butters, Mrs. W. W. Standeford, Mrs. Wallace Everson, Mrs. George Dornin, Mrs. Charles Cotton, Mrs. William A. Davis, Mrs. I. A. Chase, Mrs. J. A. Folger, Mrs. Allen D. Wilson, Mrs. W. E. Cooke, Mrs. S. T. Alexander, Mrs. William Clift, Mrs. E. T. Henshaw, Mrs. E. A. Hern, Mrs. R. W. Gorrill, Mrs. T. E. Coogan, Mrs. Edward Remillard, Mrs. H. A. Powell, Mrs. T. L. Barker, Mrs. Edward Walsh, Mrs. Edwin Taylor, Mrs. Oscar Luning, Mrs. E. B. Sanborn, Mrs. Isaac Requa, Mrs. Lama Wright, Mrs. Gordon Stolp, Mrs. W. E. Sharon, Mrs. Prentiss Selby, Mrs. John Adams, Mrs. J. M. Merritt and Mrs. W. S. Snook.

The Havemeyers have arrived in Oakland to spend the winter. They have taken a house in Linda Vista, near Mrs. Havemeyer's sister, Mrs. T. C. Tucker and her niece, Mrs. A. L. Stone. Mrs. Tucker will also entertain a sister, Mrs. Haskins of New York and her daughter, Ruth. Miss Ruth has the family gift of beauty and she is a very striking girl. Besides her beauty she will be attractive to Oaklanders from her air—Oakland, you know, is a suburb. She was graduated from the Merrill-Van Laer Finishing School in New York, she has spent years abroad and she is au fait in the ways of society.

The Impending Moore-Valentine Marriage

Popular Jacqueline Moore was won by John Valentine just in the nick of time. Big girls easily become passee, and Jacqueline is certainly no petite maiden. The marriage will be in January, but no day has yet been decided upon. It is to take place in the Church of the Advent, with that fascinating young rector, the Rev. William Carson Shaw, officiating. I wonder why all the rich girls have their weddings at that little church in East Oakland. I have heard that Tom Williams said that he liked Mr. Shaw because he "was not so deucedly religious." Perhaps, though, he never said it—things do get so twisted. Anyway, I hope that pretty little Mrs. Shaw gets the handling of all the fees, marriage and christening, that her handsome lord and master has taken in. To return to our muttons—not that I mean to call any one a sheep—lavender is to be the color scheme, chosen, a wicked one says, because it is so becoming to the bridesmaids and because it makes the tall bride look sallow—dreadful word! But a bride does not need to care; she ought to be unselfish enough to give the other girls a chance. These particular maids who look so well in the color of the shrinking violet are: Miss Ethel Moore, Miss Ethel Valentine, Miss Anita Oliver, Miss Edna Barry, Miss Florence White, Miss Marion Smith, and Miss Isabelle Hooper of Alameda.

vited her mother and step-father, Mr. and Mrs. "Jack" Schroeder, to accompany her upon a tour of the world. They are now in Florence, where they expect to pass the winter. I hear that Elena Robinson has gone there to join them. In the meantime Lena Maynard is visiting Mrs. Robinson at Santa Barbara.

Bessie's Paris Frocks

Less favored buds turn green with envy every time Bessie Wilson appears with a new frock. As Miss Wilson, like Helen Dean last year, seeks to avoid appearing twice in the same gown, the envious feelings frequently obtrude themselves. This young girl is very pretty, dark-eyed, tall and of an excellent figure. Her mother spent a fortune on her daughter's clothes, all of which came from Paris. Her lace gowns are the despair of would-be imitators.

The Burgess-Irwin Book

One may carp at Gelett Burgess's affectations and silly antics, but when he starts out to write a book he throws off all his absurdities, and only the genuine humor remains. What part of "The Reign of Queen Isyl" is due to Burgess and which portion to Will Irwin I do not know, but the collaboration of these two clever Californians has produced one of the best books of the year. It is a whimsical thing, lovely, lively nonsense like Roche's "Her Majesty the King." The manner of telling is unique, a string of tales with one long thread to bind them together.

His Relatives Are Strictly "Society"

Edward Clarke, who shocked his family by wedding the "sweet-peas girl" of Durrant trial newspaperiety, Mrs. Bowers, is the brother of Mrs. Charles Lyman and Mrs. Leslie Wright. The Clarke estate is worth considerably over a million. Nearly all the family live in Europe. Mrs. Clarke has just returned to Paris, and Mrs. Lyman and Mrs. Wright have been there for two years.

The Scientist's Romance

A pretty romance which had its inception in the Hawaiian Islands, last year, culminated happily last Wednesday, in San Jose, when Miss Claire Grace Barnheisel, the handsome and accomplished daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Barnheisel, became the wife of Charles Bradford Hudson, the well known scientist and writer. It was while on a trip to the Hawaiian Islands that Miss Barnheisel met Mr. Hudson, who was at that time a member of the United States Fish Commission, and who, in company with Dr. Jordan, was doing scientific work in the Islands. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Arthur Barnheisel of Tacoma, the brother of the bride. Following the ceremony came the wedding breakfast and at the bride's table were seated Mr. and Mrs. Barnheisel, Rev. Arthur Barnheisel and Dr. David Starr Jordan. The happy couple left for a short trip through the South and from there will go to Detroit, where they will remain during the winter. The bride is a graduate of Stanford and attended Bryn Mawr for a year. She is a member of Kappa Alpha Theta Sorority.

Miss Lucy McGeoghegan became the bride of William F. Pickstone last week at San Jose and the couple left immediately for England, where they will remain through the winter. The holidays will be spent with the groom's family at Manchester, England.

The Navy And The Army

There appears in this issue a very entertaining and instructive article on the subject of our navy and the important progress made in that branch of our military service during the year now drawing to a close. It was written for Town Talk by Mr. A. H. Dutton, an Annapolis man, who keeps in touch with the navy, its officers and their achievements. There is no department of the government in whose affairs there is more general interest than that which controls and guides the destinies of the navy. Formerly that branch of the service was subordinate in interest and importance to the army, but since it has become apparent that in the event of a clash with a foreign power our ships of war will have to bear the brunt of whatever blows are struck, and play the leading role in the international drama, we find ourselves watching with especial interest the development of the navy. However, though the army has taken second place in the affections of the people, they are not indifferent to its welfare. They have viewed with alarm the persistency of the President in sticking to his friend Wood, an inexperienced soldier, and seeking to have him elevated to a position in which he will have insurance of early promotion to the commandership of our forces. The attitude of the President toward Wood is remarkable in view of his utterances in his recent Message. He said that the only people content with a system of promotion by mere seniority are those who are contented "with the triumph of mediocrity over excellence." "On the other hand," he adds, "a system which encouraged the exercise of social or political favoritism in promotion would be even worse." Those are sane words but strikingly inconsistent with the action of the President in the Wood case.

Where Credit Belongs

Though our naval service has been greatly improved during the year, the army has not been neglected, and to one man is due the credit for all that has been accomplished. I refer to Elihu Root, who is soon to retire from the Cabinet to devote himself to his law practice. It will not be easy to find a man with the ability to carry on his work. Mr. Root has reorganized the War Department and made of it a smoothly running machine. In his last report he is able to say that no important military legislation is now necessary. We now have a General Staff and an Army War College with which to face the future without misgiving. Though we are not yet prepared for war, there is no longer chaos, and we are ready to grasp any emergency. All that is now needed are appropriations for the fortifications of the strategic harbors of our new possessions.

The Exploded Hero

Just as I suggested, three weeks ago, the halo of heroism that for a time surrounded Captain J. J. Pershing, of the Army, is becoming dimmer as the actual facts of the campaign against the Moros leak out. I do not deny that Pershing is an officer of exceptional ability, but that he had a monopoly of the glory in the Minadao expedition is far from true. In fact, as many Army officers who were there do not hesitate to say, the hardest work was done by others, notably by Colonel, now General, Frank D. Baldwin, of the Twenty-seventh Infantry. Now comes a communication, published in a service journal, and signed by "One Who Was There," in which the true history of that campaign is related. The gist of the communication is as follows: "Prior to the arrival of Colonel Baldwin in Mindanao, many depredations had been committed by the unfriendly Moros of the Lake region, and their acts were allowed to go unpunished, until both General Davis and the above practically forced the Government into allowing the troops to punish the assassins of their brother soldiers. This was accomplished; the situation came about, had to be handled, and was successfully met, not only before Captain Pershing took command of the troops in the Lake region, but even before he arrived in that district." It may be added that the expedition which really crushed the Moros, by the successive captures of the strongholds of Paulas, Ganassi, Binadayan, Pandapayan, and Bayan, was that of Baldwin, who demoralized the Moros before Pershing took a hand.

The Gallant Winslow

If President Roosevelt had carefully conned the entire Navy list, it is not likely that he could have found a man better suited to the post of his naval aid than Commander Cameron McRae Winslow, whom he has just selected for that position. "Cam" Winslow is the type of the beau sabreur. He is a fine-looking fellow, to begin with, and a thorough man of the world, of excellent family, being a nephew of the famous Captain Winslow, of Kearsarge-Alabama fame, and an officer of high ability and cool bravery of the dashing kind. He had charge of the boats in the cable-cutting exploit at Cienfuegos, Cuba, during which he was shot in the hand, but kept on calmly directing his men while he tied a handkerchief around his wound, under a galling fire at short range, men falling about him every moment. He returned to his ship, the Nashville, when his boat was recalled, after completing the job, but not before. Winslow has always been one of the fashionable men of the service, and a general favorite with both sexes in society. He remained a bachelor until well along toward middle age, when he married Miss Dora Havemeyer, daughter of the sugar magnate, and sister of Mrs. W. Butler Duncan, of New York. Duncan, too, is a Naval Academy man, who resigned shortly after graduation in the same class with Lewis Nixon.

In an obscure paragraph of a newspaper I read of the ordering of Lieutenant-Commander W. H. Allderdice, of the Navy, to special duty in Shelby, Ohio. Allderdice is the playwright of the Navy, but his fame, owing to his modesty, has not become wide outside of the service. However he has written some very bright comedies and farces which have been presented at naval amateur performances. He has always done his work of this kind for amusement only.

Banished to Florida

Commander Thomas H. Stevens, U. S. N., is the latest officer to incur banishment to one of the Navy Department's places of exile, having been ordered as ordnance officer of the Pensacola, Fla., navy-yard. "Tom" Stevens is well known on the Pacific coast, where he has been on duty long and often. There is no more genial officer in the service, and, like his father, the late Rear-Admiral Thomas H. Stevens, he embodies the characteristics of the old-school naval officer, which, however, have at times got him into disfavor with his seniors. The South Atlantic station, for sea duty, and the Bremerton, Port Royal and Pensacola yards for shore duty, have long been the lots of those officers upon whom the department wished to visit its displeasure. However, no matter where he goes, "Tom" Stevens always wins popularity.

I learned with regret the other day of an accident that befell Mrs. Reginald F. Nicholson, wife of Commander "Reggie" Nicholson, of the new cruiser Tacoma. Mrs. Nicholson is an enthusiastic golfer, and while teeing for the fifth hole in an exciting game on the Chevy Chase links, near Washington, D. C., she made a misstep, severely wrenching her knee. She was badly lamed and has had to abandon golfing for the present.

A Source of Turf Scandal

The latest turf scandal across the bay directed attention to the fact that racing officials are kept busy purging the sport of its harmful influences. I am informed that there is concerted action among the officials throughout the country to minimize the opportunities for foul play, and that they have made much progress in late years. A matter that is now absorbing their attention, though the public has not been taken into their confidence, is that of the "jockey manager" who is said to be a fruitful source of trouble and complaint from horse owners and trainers. The rapacity of individuals whose only claim to consideration was the influence they exercised over the race riders temporarily in fashion, has frequently called for official action, and if the wishes of the majority of turfmen are realized the "jockey manager" will soon find that his vocation is gone. The owners of racing establishments of moderate size, and the professional horsemen who combine the ownership and training of horses as a matter of business, have started a crusade against the parasites of the turf, and turf legislation for their suppression may soon be expected. The big racing establishments escape much of the annoyance because they hire their riders by the year, but it is the lesser fry of the turf that suffers. Sometimes the manager is the father of the boy, and sometimes he is an obscure horse-owner who has what is known as the "first call" on the services of some jockey of repute and skill. The manager is generally a heavy better, and his influence is generally of a most pernicious character. He often requires that a bet be put on for either the rider or himself and if it is not forthcoming the would-be employer is told that the jockey is too ill to ride or that he cannot make the weight. Occasionally the manager dictates as to how the horse should be ridden, even though his directions be contrary to the wishes of the trainer of the animal. The practices of many of these managers will not stand the light, and there has been enough scandal connected with the conduct of some of them to make their suppression imperative.

Not of the Ancient Nobility

Prince Poniatowski has returned to New York after a short visit to the other side. When he left here it was said he was going to shift his residence to Paris where he was going into the banking business with what remained of his wife's fortune, but now I hear that he contemplates returning to this city. Some days ago an Eastern daily published his pedigree to show that he was not a representative of the old Poniatowskis, the last of that family, Prince Adelbert, having died in the first half of the seventeenth century. It appears that the nobility of which our Prince Poniatowski is a representative is almost as new as some of our new-rich. The title was bestowed on his father by the Austrian sovereign in 1850. His mother was the daughter of the Countess of Hon. Poniatowski, by the way, has an elder brother, Charles, who lives with his wife and mother-in-law in Mexico. He is more or less of an invalid, suffering from an affection of the eyes. Prince Andre is suffering from an affection of the wrist and he was in danger, some time ago, of losing a section of his forearm, but a friend who met him recently in New York informs me that he has greatly improved in health.

A Poet's Prophetic Prose

As in ancient times the poets of Carthage, Athens and Rome proclaimed the glories of their native cities, so in this issue of Town Talk, that gifted bard, Herman Scheffauer, proudly exalts the metropolis of the Pacific. Mr. Scheffauer writes forcible prose as well as melodious verse, as witness the following, which gives a hint to the feelings of the poet: "Let him who doubts our future smile at enthusiasm. Neither cities nor aught else can be built of the smiles of doubters, but today as ever before, the stones leap into place when Trust and Faith and Industry lay mightily about them; these are the true hill-moving melodies of Amphion whence spring the lordly palaces from seeds of flowers. Surely our city of St. Francis by the sea must, shall and will grow unto the imperial importance of a mighty metropolis. 'Westward the star,' etc., wrote Bishop Berkeley, but here is that star's true resting place, for all that lies beyond these sands of the Pacific is East again. Here is that star's true resting place; here it will wax and wax in splendor until it flashes one of the brightest in the firmament of this and future centuries. No poetic rapture, no seer's insight need stand for this prophecy—its realization will be brought about through economic, natural and commercial conditions, and through our own powerful endeavoring. Ours must be a nobler, broader pride than that which filled the aristocratic cities of the eighteenth century Germany. Commerce, too (a worthy and legitimate theme, I say, for poets), vast and rich, and wide-spreading have I glorified, for since we front the seas, our commerce must make us strong and prosperous, though be it ever remembered that only our Arts and Letters can make us great and glorious. And that this, too, shall be achieved, who can

Bohemians Will Celebrate

The burlesque on "Ben Hur," which the Bohemian Club will present at its low jinks tonight, has caused a great deal of comment. The knockers say it is sacrilegious, and the optimists say it is no such thing. Will Irwin has burlesqued "Ben Hur" with a neat and clean touch, and those who have read the travesty say that it is as full of genuine humor as the author's "Isyl," which he wrote in collaboration with Gelett Burgess. J. D. Phelan will sire the high jinks, and his call to brother-Bohemians to be present on the occasion is very prettily phrased. The beginning reads:

Bohemians: The wise men of Bohemia have handed down to us the Christmas Jinks—the great Club convocation of the year—to wean us (perhaps only for a night) from the craft and worldliness of the daily grind and to nourish and exhilarate us with spiritual nectar and ambrosia and the mighty mead of Valhalla. Soul-satisfying, indeed, is music, song and speech, color and form; and worthy is the theme when its inspiration is love. Christmas is the season of love and let us, therefore, obedient to immemorial custom, assemble in this temple and here prove our peculiar titles to Bohemian Brotherhood. "Let us be merry and clever," said Goldsmith, and so say we all of us. Let us be thankful for the little given in the name of good cheer and by an appreciation and pleasure make it much and so we may get more and more, as love begets love.

The wind-up is:

So come like Roman legionaries, in force, but cease, for the nonce, your pagan conflicts; submit to the sway of the joyous and gentle sentiments of the season, and "Peace be with thee and thine."

Several neophytes will be initiated into the mysteries of Bohemia, High Priest Bromley officiating. Governor Pardee, Judge Henshaw, Judge Sloss and others will "bestride the jocund goat and climb the Parnassian Hill." Dr. H. J. Stewart will have the music in charge and L. Maynard Dixon will paint the cartoon.

Jack Wilson will give a stag dinner tonight at the Bohemian Club to all the performers in the high and low jinks and it will be one of the jolliest occasions of the kind that the club has known. Jack Wilson is one of the most genial and by far the most generous host in Bohemia. There is no limit to either his generosity or his good-nature.

Gordon Ross is going to retire from newspaper art work and devote himself to designing stained glass windows. It is a field of art work not so crowded as the ordinary, and it should be a good financial move for Mr. Ross.

Informal Hop at Del Monte

One of the first of a series of informal hops was given at Hotel Del Monte last Friday evening. The ballroom of this popular resort was comfortably filled, many of San Francisco's best families as well as a large number of army officers from the new encampment at Monterey being in attendance. The army men present included the following: Captain Brooks, Captain Uline, Captain Bridges, Captain Conrad, Lieutenant Awl, Lieutenant Potter, Lieutenant Knabenshue, Lieutenant Boyce, Lieutenant Upham, Lieutenant Burr, Lieutenant Gilmore, Captain Fowler, Major Bigelow, Lieutenant Bell, Captain H. A. Smith. Colonel Ward and his officers of the Fifteenth Infantry and the Ninth Cavalry are very popular in society. At all Del Monte affairs arranged for the present season, the buds and belles have every assurance of army men for dancing partners. Special rates between San Francisco and Del Monte for the Christmas and New Year holidays are being arranged.

Louis is a Spender

It is said that one reason why Mrs. Bruguiere intends prolonging her visit with her son Louis at Newport is to control the pursestrings. For sonny has been going a reckless pace entertaining his New York friends. It costs, you know, to keep up the gait at Newport. Louis Bruguiere is very popular for he is a good fellow and he is handsome, too. The mixture of French, Spanish, English and Swedish blood ran to good looks as well as to brains in the Bruguiere family. Emil Bruguiere's opera is now being rehearsed in Chicago, and will be put on the stage by the Bostonians next month.

"I find society people a dreadful bore," sighed Miss Unconventional Bud to her dearest friend.

"Did you ever stop to think, dear," returned the latter, "that they may be entertaining the same sentiments toward yourself?"

The Evasive Mr. Phelan

James D. Phelan, formerly Mayor of San Francisco, and accustomed in general to the deference due his wealth and position in the community, took part last Monday in a public debate with Garret McEnerney, the attorney, and his plumage was ruffled. The subject was the proposed reduction of grade on Golden Gate avenue from Taylor to Hyde streets, and a subject which seems to awaken no end of bitterness and controversy. McEnerney appeared for St. Boniface's church, owned and built by the Franciscan Fathers, and he opened the debate by asking Mr. Phelan how much he thought his property would be increased in value by the change of grade. Mr. Phelan, with his characteristic skill in evasion, side-stepped the query. Thereupon McEnerney referred sarcastically to the distinguished publicist who was advocating the improvement and argued that if he could not tell how much the change would benefit him it was not likely that he was competent to estimate the benefits to be conferred on the public at large. Only the millionaire owners of property on Golden Gate avenue, said McEnerney, want the improvement, and he suggested that the name of the thoroughfare be changed to Millionaires' avenue. The whole secret of the proposition, said the lawyer, was that Mr. Phelan feared that the retail shopping district would not work its way out Golden Gate avenue, but that it would extend out McAllister street. In his reply, Mr. Phelan said that the proposition was so simple that an attorney was not necessary to set it forth, and by inference he gave the impression that he thought he was made a target for sarcasm because he had chosen to appear in person rather than by attorney. The Board of Supervisors decided to seek further information before passing a resolution of intention to change the grade.

George Hall has just returned from a roughing-it trip in Tuolumne county, where he went on mining business. The Turkish Consul is interested in mines these days. By the way, Mr. Hall has lost a great deal of flesh, and is now as thin as he always wished to be. In his recent illness his avoirdupois reduced itself at a rapid rate.

Conventional But Charitable

Sarah Collier left for an extended tour through the East last week. She is one of the handsomest of our society girls, and I predict that she will flutter the hearts of the impressionable youths of Gotham when she strikes that town. But at the same time, I fear, she will not enter into the social whirl of the East with much enthusiasm, for she is one of the most conventional of girls. She views with disapproval many of the ways of our wild and woolly smart set. Of late she has been deeply interested in charitable projects and she had a class in cooking south of the slot to which she devoted a great deal of attention. The most devoted of her admirers is Lieutenant Winship.

"Miss Shy is dying for a kiss."

"How do you know? Are you a mind-reader?"

"Not exactly—but she has been gazing hungrily at the mistletoe for fifteen minutes."

Mrs. Irwin's Transformation

Mrs. W. H. Irwin attracted a deal of attention at the Twentieth Century Musical Club's musicale last week. She seemed in the best of spirits and smiled and nodded to her friends in the parquet. Her hair has become a golden brown this season, and many of her friends hardly recognized her, so great was the change in her appearance. Mrs. Irwin has long been one of the handsomest of our matrons, and her gray hair made her very distingue. The fashionable shade, in my opinion, is not half so becoming.

She Disappointed Him

Mrs. Blanchard, who sang the part of Orpheus in the scene from the Gluck opera, looked like a Burne-Jones model with her classic features, artistic coiffure and gown. One of our well-known club men was very much disappointed because he had expected to see the scene from Orpheus done in costume. He remarked to a friend that he never would have sat through the long program if he had known that Mrs. Blanchard was not to appear in the attractive garb of the mythological hero.

She Wore a Night Dress

Night-gowns are becoming the mode for evening parties in Stockton, writes a correspondent. On the occasion of a book party recently, a very pretty girl who is popular in the slough city's swim created a sensation by appearing in a robe de nuit, and she made such a hit that others are said to favor the vogue of the loose-flowing white garment for evening as well as night wear. It was the purpose of the night-gown girl to symbolize "When Knighthood was in Flower." She wore flowers in her hair. They are refreshingly unconventional in Stockton. The kimona is now worn at formal receptions, or at least it was recently by a hostess, who presented a pretty picture reclining on a divan.

A Lady Journalist

We may be visited soon by Miss Jennie Brooks, who is at present in Chicago, and who was sent across the pond by the London Telegraph to "do" Americans from the English lady-journalist's point of view. From a Chicago correspondent I learn that Miss Brooks is everything the American newspaper woman is not. She's exactly like the stage presentations of journalists, and goes about advertising her profession. She is not a pretty woman and is aggressively unfeminine in manner, wears a tweed suit, a bike-cap and shoes with heavy soles.

A Family of Spellbinders

Charley Wheeler, the attorney, thinks that a nimble wit that survives a full stomach is a beatitude devoutly to be coveted. He is therefore intent on rearing a family of post-prandial spellbinders, and to that end he turns his dining-room into a school of instruction in after-dinner speaking. The Wheelers have an interesting group of children—four girls and a boy—and they are bright youngsters. There is no nursery dinner in the Wheeler house, but the whole family constitutes quite a dinner party. At the close of the dinner Mr. Wheeler acts as toastmaster and each of the children is called on to respond to a sentiment. In that way they are learning to think on their feet and are becoming graceful talkers. Mr. Wheeler, himself, is a good after-dinner talker, and he has a talent for spinning yarns and writing doggerel.

The Bridegroom Has Friends Here

When Mrs. Daniel Kane was in New York recently, she attended the marriage of her brother-in-law, Frank Kane, son of Captain Kane of the Navy. Frank Kane has often visited San Francisco. He is one of Mrs. George Gibbs's nephews, and a cousin of Colonel Delancey Kane of New York. He married a New York heiress of good family and they are enjoying a honeymoon trip to the Bermudas.

A Cause Celebre

The paragraphers paid little attention to the passing of the Countess of Euston, a little more than a week ago. Yet the Countess was once the heroine of a cause celebre that disturbed the equanimity of many high and mighties. She was the daughter-in-law of the Duke of Grafton. As he is an octogenarian and in feeble health, there was imminent danger of his demise, in which case of course his son would succeed to the title. The British Peerage therefore had a narrow escape from having admitted to membership a representative of the London half-world. When Lord Euston was a mere boy in the early twenties, he married Kate Cook, or Walsh, a woman of the demi-monde. He speedily came to his senses, however, and having settled ten thousand pounds upon his undesirable wife, he hied himself to the Antipodes, where he remained for a number of years. The ten thousand pounds were soon dissipated. Then Lady Euston brought suit against the Earl for alimony and a restoration of her conjugal rights. The Earl, who had completely cut himself off from his wife after the first disillusionment, promptly brought suit for divorce. During the trial of the case it was shown that at the time of her marriage with Euston Kate Walsh had a husband living—one Smith, of New Zealand. The old Duke was elated at this discovery and promptly took measures to secure Smith's testimony. But the important witness proved too ready with his facts. The fault of his testimony was that there was too much of it. In addition to admitting his marriage he stated that when he wedded Kate Walsh he had another wife living. The Smith marriage therefore was proved invalid, and the way was clear for the union with Grafton's heir. Nothing could be done but to throw the case out of court, and the old Duke's elation was changed to chagrin. The Countess had been regarded as irresponsible, if not demented, for years, and the only hope of ridding the Peerage of her name was to have the marriage declared null and void, since her mental condition protected her from the consequences of her acts. The old Duke of Grafton, by the way, is one of the few peers of England who still run their estates on the feudal plan. He is said to be a veritable tyrant, and makes his tenants attend church whether they like it or not.

She Continues to Mobe

Ethyl Hager was warned by her physician not long ago that she must quit running her automobile because she would imperil her life. Miss Hager's heart was pronounced weak some years since, and she had to stay in bed for months, taking the rest cure. But Ethyl Hager is self-willed, and she still continues her daring chauffeuse stunts on the boulevards.

"I'd rather die than abandon my mobe," was her reply to the medico.

The next Gaiety Club dance will take place January fourth, not at Mare Island, as the dailies have stated, but in this city. Mrs. McCalla is thinking of having it at Century hall, by way of concession to the men who do not like to go as far as Mare Island for a dance. Besides, cab rates increase rapidly after midnight.

Gone South for Christmas

Mrs. Henry Crocker has gone to Southern California with her children, to pass a week with her mother. She desired to give the children a real Christmas in the country. Mrs. Crocker, by the way, is one of the most generous women in town at this season. She gives very handsome presents to the humblest of her servants. She is, I am told, one of the few women in society who are not always grumbling at having trouble with their domestic help. She manages to run her household on well-oiled wheels, and in spite of her devotion to her children she finds time for society's many claims. Mrs. Crocker is wearing a diamond necklace that is the delight and despair of her friends. She has never dressed so magnificently as she has this winter.

Ray Sherman is due here from Manila within a few days, and will spend Christmas in San Francisco. His wife returned from the Orient in the summer.

Sample Irish Wit

The other day, Tim McGrath, the wag of the tenderloin, went before the Police Commissioners to obtain permission to enlarge the private rooms of his saloon. The commissioners asked him the object of the proposed enlargement and he replied:

"My customers say the rooms are so small that they can't put their hands in their pockets and fish the money out without dislocating their arms. So I have many outstanding debts."

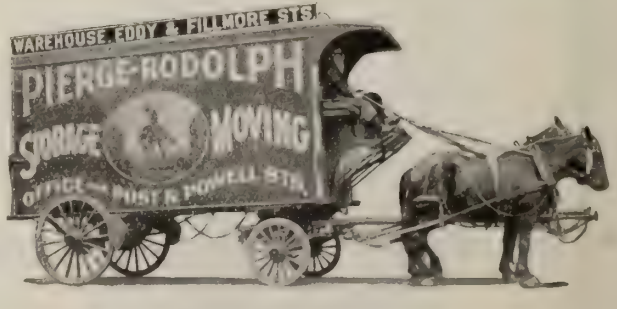
The permit was granted.

The Mark of Informality

Avery McCarthy is paying devoted attention these days to Mrs. Clement, a beautiful and wealthy young widow from South Africa, who is at the California hotel, and who has been entertained recently at the University Club. Mrs. Clement is still in mourning for her late husband who left her a large fortune, it is said, but the University Club functions have been informal affairs. I hear that their informality was marked by the absence of candelabra.

The J. J. Moores are up from Menlo for the winter and are at the Palace.

The De Young Vaudeville



Preparations for the De Young vaudeville are going on merrily. It will be pulled off New Year's night. Wallace Irwin is again the librettist and H. J. Stewart is the composer. The society amateurs are already deep in rehearsals. Among those who are to participate is Mrs. Marcus Gerstle, who had originally intended to do a stunt at the Verein jinks. But when invited to appear in the De Young vaudeville she decided to cut out the Verein, and as a consequence there has been some grumbling.

Nothing Snobbish About Them

The ball given by the Misses Huntington this week had none of the garish splendor that one usually associates with a millionaire's fete. The Huntington residence is very homelike and very well adapted to an informal affair of that sort. Moreover the young ladies of the house of Huntington are simple and unaffected in manner, and they choose their friends without regard for the hallmarks of the elite. They have been criticised by the exclusives for what has been called a lack of discrimination, but when they go in for social gayety they give no thought to wealth or social position. In other words, the Huntington girls are not snobs.

In a recent interview published in a New York paper, Madame Patti, who is now concert-touring her way westward, said: "The American climate is as exhilarating as champagne, and has the same effect on my health and spirits." There is no doubt that the diva referred to one champagne in particular, Ayala, which everybody agrees has a delightfully exhilarating effect. And the best of it is that the exhilaration promoted by the consumption of Ayala has no after effects of an opposite character.

The Year in Drama

Nothing especially noteworthy occurred in the dramatic world aside from the first visit of Mrs. "Pat" Campbell to San Francisco. She appeared in her repertory but Sudermann's "The Joy of Living" proved her most successful play. Rose Coghlan had just shown us her version of "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" and more than one critic, and two-thirds of our theatre-goers, preferred the Coghlan treatment of the Pinero heroine to that of Mrs. Campbell. Another Pinero play which was recently produced gave food for more discussion than anything that has ever been given here. This was "Iris," with Virginia Harned Sothern in the title role. The largest scenic production of the year was "Ben Hur" which played a record-breaking engagement of four weeks at the Grand Opera House. The chief happenings at the Columbia, beside those already named, in 1903 were Warde and James in "The Tempest," Frank Daniels in "Miss Simplicity," Anna Held and her "Sadie" girls, William Gillette in "Sherlock Holmes," Effie Ellsler in "When Knighthood was in Flower," Mary Mannering in "The Stubbornness of Geraldine," Nat Goodwin in "On the Altar of Friendship," W. H. Crane in "David Harum," Amelia Bingham in "The Climbers," Robert Edeson in "Soldiers of Fortune," Edward Sothern and Cecilia Loftus in "If I were King." Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin played a joint-star season but none of the new plays presented hit the popular taste. At the Grand starring seasons were played by Charles Erin Verner, Maude Odell, Walter Perkins, Emmett Corrigan, R. D. MacLean and Odette Tyler, and Nance O'Neil. Miss O'Neil produced a new drama, "Judith," beside her repertory. She was to have played a later engagement at the Republic, but the theatre burned down and she appeared instead at the California, producing Sardou's "Fedora" and "La Tosca," and Ibsen's "Hedda Gabler." The Grand also had a season of the Rogers Brothers productions. The California had Rose Coghlan, Kate Claxton in "The Two Orphans," and a season of burlesque opera by the Augustin Daly Comedy Company, among other things. The Republic opened with a stock company including George de Long and Harrison Reynolds, but it was not financially successful. The management then tried a new venture, in a revival of minstrelsy modeled upon the old Charlie Reed--Billy Emerson minstrels, in connection with an original burlesque written by Wallace Irwin. This was an artistic hit, but not sufficiently so financially to warrant its continuance. The burning of the theatre put a final damper upon its career. At the Alcazar, continued success with an excellent stock company has been the rule. E. D. Price came on from New York to assume the business management of the Belasco-Mayer theatres, and he has proved a splendid acquisition. The theatre has had three new leading ladies in 1903—Alice Treat Hunt, Bertha Creighton and Adele Block, the present incumbent. Ernest Hastings played a short engagement as leading man. There were starring seasons by White Whittlesey and Florence Roberts. The latter produced among other things "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch," a new play by Mrs. Burton Harrison. She also gave a matinee performance of "The Ballad of Despair" and produced D'Annunzio's "La Gioconda" for the first time in this city. One of the best of the stock productions of the early season was "The Case of Rebellious Susan" in which Juliet Crosby had the leading role. "Lover's Lane," with Hastings as the hero, was another hit. The Central has sustained its reputation as a family theatre where everything is given on a fine scenic scale. "Resurrection," with Miss Lawton as the heroine, was a strong production. Herschel Mayall succeeded Landers Stevens as leading man, and is one of the most popular leading men in the city at this time. Charles Cook, by reason of ill health, resigned from the Central's management, and was succeeded by George H. Davis, the former treasurer of the theatre. The Tivoli had a Gilbert and Sullivan revival, and a very successful production of "The Highwayman" with Camille d'Arville and Edwin Stevens in the star roles. Arthur Cunningham, a local baritone, made one of the big hits in this opera. Stevens also appeared in others of his successes. "The Toy Maker" had a brief revival, and there was a strong grand opera season to wind up the affairs of the old opera house, which is now no more. The new Tivoli will open with "Ixion." Fischer's had its usual array of successes, the Weber & Fields burlesques being followed by two from Chicago, and by a native production, "I. O. U." To Fischer's belongs the distinction, if such it may be designated, of introducing to local johnnies the metropolitan type of chorus girl. The Orpheum had a brilliant array of vaudeville stars, acrobats, magicians, contortionists, monologuists and musicians. Among them were Richard Jose, our contra tenor par excellence, Mary Hampton, Lillian Burkhart and Lydia Yeamans Titus. The Chutes, too, had its bright array of vaudeville talent, May Lamson with her illustrated songs proving the reigning favorite. Other attractions that appealed to the cultured were "Everyman," the morality play, produced at the Lyric with a London company under Ben Greet's management; the Burton Holmes and Tyndall lectures and those of Sandow.

When Blue Jeans Was Young

The play at the Alcazar next week will be a novelty to the younger generations of holiday playgoers, but there is no American comedy-drama more thickly overrun by luxuriant growths of interesting theatrical association. There was a tremendous ado over it when first produced at the Fourteenth street theatre, New York, some twelve years ago. It was so novel, picturesque and striking that rumor associated with its authorship the late A. C. Wheeler, whose pungent and powerful theatrical reviews in the World, over the signature of "Nym Crinkle," were among the most notable products of New York journalism. Wheeler published emphatical denial. "To my personal knowledge," he declared, "Joseph Arthur conceived and constructed 'Blue Jeans without anybody's assistance. In fact, nobody could have written that play who had not been brought up in Indiana. The local color, the personages, the scenes, are directly out of that soil and are reproductions of incidents in his early career." Of the original "Blue Jeans" cast many players have risen to national distinction. Robert Hilliard, who played Perry Bascom, has vibrated between stock-broking and acting and is now a five hundred dollar a week headliner in vaudeville. Jennie Yeamans, the original June, has just achieved a new hit in the Harrigan revivals. Laura Burt, who succeeded her, is now supporting Sir Henry Irving. Jack Wallace, who created the quaint old shoemaker, is now dead; but San Franciscans remember him as one of the famous stock company at the old California in 1885. George Fawcett, the villain who flung the hero in front of the buzz-saw eating its way to his unconscious form, is now the manager of a profitable chain of stock theatres in Baltimore, Washington and other Eastern cities. It is doubtful if "Blue Jeans" ever had a better all-round cast than will be afforded by the Alcazar's clever and versatile players.

THE MELANI TRIO

Christmas Attractions Offered

The theatres have an admirable showing for the holiday season. At the Columbia will be Lulu Glaser in the second week of "Dolly Varden." The Grand will have an attraction in which heart interest predominates, May Stockton in "A Little Outcast." The company in support is a good one, and the scenery will be attractive. The week beginning tomorrow matinee will be devoted to benefits for the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the San Francisco Fire Department. Nellie B. Waters, a daughter of a battalion Chief of the Fire Department, will perform a selection from "William Tell" on the musical sleighbells. The performance will close with a realistic fire drama in one act and three scenes, illustrating the bravery and heroism of the Fire Department and their methods of working. The firemen and apparatus appear by consent of the Fire Commissioners and Chief T. D. Sullivan. The police officers who handle the crowd have permission to do so from the Board of Police Commissioners and Chief of Police George W. Wittman. At the Alcazar will be "Blue Jeans," the famous buzz-saw drama. A musical extravaganza will delight the Central's clientele—"Alphonse and Gaston," founded on the adventures of the comic-supp. Opper Frenchmen. George T. Smith wrote the book and Emil Bierman the music. It is said to be full of fun for young and old. The cast will introduce a ballet of "birdie" girls, in plumage of radiant beauty; Virginia Ainsworth, from the Metropolitan opera company, New York, who will sing the latest Eastern vocal successes; Tony West, comedian, and Elsie G. Rafael, the "rag time pianiste," who will play selections from Wagner, Beethoven, Liszt and other great composers and then reduce the compositions to popular ragtime. The scenery will be all new. Fischer's will have a continuation of the successful "I. O. U.," new features in song and dance being added to the present list of bonbons. The Tivoli box-office is now open and a sumptuous production of "Ixion" will fittingly christen the new house. The new people in the company are Wallace Brownlow, the English baritone, who is a second Hayden Coffin in voice, and as dashing and magnetic an actor as Eugene Cowles. Bessie Tannehill, a charming character comedienne of experience, will also be an acquisition. Annie Meyers, Anna Lichter, Arthur Cunningham, Ferris Hartman and others of the old favorites will swell the cast. The production will be sumptuously staged and costumed. There will be several gorgeous ballets directed by Bothwell Browne. The delightful ballet movement from Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker Suite" will be one of the incidental numbers played by Director Steindorff and his orchestra. A transformation scene, "Excelsior, the Triumph of Light," will be a feature. The Orpheum Road Show headlines the Orpheum's playbill. Caesar, the mind-reading poodle-star of Merian's pantomimists, will appear with eight other canine actors in "A Faithless Woman, a playlet told in action. Ed. F. Reynard, ventriloquist; Elizabeth Murray, the Irish monologuiste; Ernest Hogan, "the unbleached American," with Mattie Wilkes and two colored companion artists; the Melani trio of Italian street singers; Fred Eckhoff and Anna Gordon in a musical comedy act; Albertus and Miller, comedy club singers and cornetists; the Nightons, herculean athletes, and Henri Humberti, European comedy juggler, will complete the list. At the Chutes will be the Juvenile Vaudevillians from the California School of Ballet, in Amazon marches, vocal solos, duets and trios; Joe and Sadie Britton, colored singers and dancers; Esmeralda, Al. H. Tyrrell, and Vera Chandon, contralto, in the latest illustrated ballads.

A Sangre Azul In Cog

Those society girls who affect to find the men of their set bores, and who are ever looking for new experiences in masculine attention, should turn their eyes on the "Foxy Grandpa" company. There's a member of that organization who also found society a bore, and took to the stage to chase away that blase feeling. Eugene Redding the young man is billed, but that is not his real name. His family is one of the swellest in Montreal, and they boast blood of the bluest French brand. The actor's father is a distinguished jurist. Eugene, who is not more than thirty years of age, studied to be a physician but he found medical studies too dry and decided to go on the stage. His father objected, but as the son promised to bill himself under an assumed name, pere finally withdrew his opposition, and also agreed to continue Eugene's allowance.

Caroline Gardiner, of the "Peggy from Paris" company, was a protegee of the late Philip D. Armour, the Chicago pork-packer. Miss Gardiner was sent abroad by her patron, and many thousand dollars were spent upon the cultivation of her voice. If report speaks true, the dollars were not expended unwisely. Miss Gardiner is enjoying her first road season.

DOROTHY BROWNLOW

This beautiful child is not a candidate for histrionic honors, but she has been adopted as the mascot of the new Tivoli, where her father, Wallace Brownlow, the renowned English baritone, will make his appearance next week. When the above picture was taken she was engaged in making a floral horseshoe, which, when it was completed, she hung, with her own lily-white hands, beneath the stage of the new opera house. Miss Brownlow is the daintiest British lass that ever crossed the water.

Miss Haden's Courage

If Miss Joan Hadenfeldt possessed talent in proportion to the confidence which she has in herself there would be no occasion for her friends to have any misgivings regarding her theatrical career. Some time ago it was reported that she was in the wings of a local theatre all ready to take the footlight plunge, and that her courage failed her just as her cue was given. If Miss Haden—the name by which she is to be known to fame, providing she achieves it—was ever timid, she must have been taking liberal doses of courage capsules for a long time. It requires considerable courage to risk the money that must have been expended in her preparations for her debut, for the success of her somewhat novel stunt is problematical. Not only was the first cost considerable, but to make her venture a paying one she will have to draw a very large salary, and it is doubtful whether vaudeville managers can be induced to go to great expense for a turn which is far from sensational and which is not likely to invoke the highest enthusiasm. The act itself is not an original conception. Song illustrations have almost run their course on the vaudeville stage, and Miss Haden has merely improved on the old, familiar stunt by introducing living pictures instead of the canvas ones. And living pictures are out of date. However she could achieve an artistic triumph were she to take the place of the lady who does the posing and hire some one to do the singing and wear the home-made gowns. Miss Haden looks prettier than she sings. Indeed she is a beautiful woman, and people would go miles to see her illustrating the four seasons of love. I am sure they would stand for a few extra seasons. But unfortunately, Miss Haden cannot sing. She has a voice of pleasing quality that no doubt thrilled many a parlor audience, but in a large theatre its narrow compass becomes painfully apparent. It is a voice, however, susceptible of great improvement, but tone production is something Miss Haden has not learned, and enunciation, which is no unimportant feature of the vocal art and which is of paramount importance for one engaged in seeking to justify a series of pictures, she appears to have neglected. But she gives some evidence of an artistic temperament, and with the right kind of instruction in the vocal art she may fit herself for the career which she has adopted prematurely. Meanwhile it is to be hoped that her exceptionally striking presence and her pretty pictures will carry her through.

Lotta and Belle Tobin have a musical stunt that is artistic and entertaining. The former has been heard at the Orpheum before, with her husband, Fitzroy Tobin, whose successful career was cut short by death. Her sister is a vaudeville debutante. They were known as the Rodgers sisters in the days when they played the banjo and guitar to concert audiences, and they are both very talented. They are gifted with physical charms above the average, too, and that always counts on the stage. They received as warm a welcome on Sunday night from the audience as did Joan Hadenfeldt, and the applause was fully justified by their musical turn.

Tyndall's Phenomenal Success

Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall, the exponent of the marvelous, closed a six months' series of psychic science lectures here last Sunday evening to an audience that taxed the capacity of Steinway hall. Tyndall's subject on that occasion was "Our Common Birthright," and it was a forceful, practical exposition of the inherent right of man to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," together with some practical hints on the art of acquiring the same. There are many who will deeply regret his departure, as the psychic science lectures given by the noted telepathist have appealed to the intelligence of the many seeking light upon these intricate problems. Tomorrow night Tyndall has consented to give a demonstration of the feats of magnetism made famous by "The Georgia Wonder," and will give an explanation of the principle by which the feat may be performed, proving that it is a power that is perfectly natural to all. The evening will be one of psychic entertainment solely, as there will be no lecture other than the exposition of the force which enables the "Magnet" to perform her wonderful and puzzling feats. There will undoubtedly be an immense audience, and reserved seats may be secured at Steinway hall box-office today. This will be the last public appearance of the famous psychic scientist here this season, as he leaves for Los Angeles immediately after Christmas.

DR. ALEXANDER J. McIVOR-TYNDALL

Arthur Boyce had to substitute for Max Dill at Fischer's this week, the latter being laid low with a severe attack of pneumonia. Boyce used to be a utility tenor at the Tivoli, but he hasn't much of a voice. I have heard that he was a guard at the Folsom penitentiary when somebody discovered he had musical talent which should be cultivated. He came to San Francisco and studied for the stage, in time being given principal roles. He has done some things—notably the tenor role in "The Geisha"—very well. He filled Dill's role at a pinch acceptably. Dill has had substitutes before; once when he broke his leg. The new Hebrew at Fischer's, by the way, is a long way after Barney Bernard.

Manager Cleveland was not the first one to accuse McKee Rankin of having Nance O'Neil under an hypnotic spell. Blanche Bates was the first to make that assertion, years ago, when she was out here with the Frawley company. She and Frawley used to watch Rankin exert his influence on her and they said she was another Trilby. When Nance first went on the stage her mother, Mrs. Lamson, charged Rankin with placing her daughter under a spell.

There's a big dash of Captain Mayne Reid, and a touch of J. Fennimore Cooper, in the Central's bill this week. Herschel Mayall is a combination of the book-heroes boys love, as he struts the stage in the garb of the Government scout. He is a hero to thrill all hearts. There are outlaws and Indians, a stockman and his charming daughter, and many other roles to distract attention from the hero-scout, but he holds his own in spite of them. All the company are in the cast and Myrtle Vane makes a hit all her own as the waif. The scenery fits in well with the situations and characters of "The Scout's Revenge."

It is refreshing to think that even in this day of problem plays and musical comedies there still exists warm appreciation for dramas of the purely poetic and fine flavor. "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," at the Grand, is one of these and a second hearing of the homely dialogue, a second sight of the simple, beautiful setting, only intensifies one's respect for the art of the man who wrote the book and the actor who plays the principal part. Stoddart said once that he would like to end his days playing the part of Lachlan Campbell; that he felt he could never get anything that would fit him better. And he was right. The whole story of the play centres about the old, stern, dogmatical Scotchman. In his lighter moments the audience is moved to like feelings; in the pathetic and tragic scenes, one never loses sympathy with the character. That is art of a kind few of the newer school of actors understand.

Juliet Crosby was given a Patti welcome at the Alcazar this week. There's a large section of "The Girl I Left Behind Me" in which she had a share of the stage centre, and she was made to feel her popularity every time she had a line. When it wasn't applause, it was a big wave of sympathy that reached across the footlights from audience to actress. It's a pity Miss Crosby won't permit herself to appear oftenener than three or four times a year, on the stage of her husband's theatre. She always brightens up a cast. The Belasco-Fyles drama is very well done. Osbourne is the General and Durkins is the hero, while Conness has the role of Parlow. Miss Starr as Wilber's Ann is delightful.

America's Premiere Soubrette

Chic and ginger are deliciously blended in Lulu Glaser. She is the most talented comedienne that has come out of Broadway in many a day. So spontaneous is her humor and so sparkling is her acting, that she doesn't have to confine her talents to comic opera. She could win success in plain, unadorned legitimate comedy, for she is a comedienne with an infectious humor, from her dainty ankles to her finger-tips. As a comic opera soubrette she has no peer on the American stage today. In "Dolly Varden" she has such a congenial role that she can afford to be generous to everybody else in the cast, and the consequence is that all the principals have plenty of opportunity to prove their mettle. However, none of them threatens for a single minute to share the honors with the star, and yet her support is far from weak. It contains several fairly good voices, and all the people in the cast contribute intelligently to the rounding out of a smooth and wholesome performance. "Dolly Varden" approximates comic opera, and it is decidedly welcome after we have been surfeited with the horseplay of a long string of inane musical comedies. The title might suggest that the work has some connection with "Barnaby Rudge," but it hasn't. The libretto is based on Garrick's revised version of Wycherly's comedy, "The Country Girl," but there is little of the Wycherlian in the opera. Indeed the book is a trifle tame, for while the story is interesting and highly amusing, the lines lack sparkle. There is but a single epigram—

HARRY S. HILLIARD

A sensible, manly, unaffected young fellow, singularly unsusceptible to flattery, is Harry S Hilliard, who plays the good looking, well groomed juveniles so admirably at the Alcazar. In this picture Mr. Hilliard is not inditing replies to passionate protestations from callow, caramel consuming matinee girls. He is writing home to his mother.

"The man that marries a woman for her money, earns it." The lyrics are uninspired, but as they are melodious one doesn't mind their being dragged in. The one with which Miss Glaser scores the most is "The Jay Bird." Harold Blake, the tenor of the company, John Dunsmure, the basso, Harry Girard, the baritone, and Lillian Walbridge, the soprano, each contributes pleasing vocal numbers and in voices superior to those we have become accustomed to hearing in recent musical comedy companies. But Miss Glaser is the scintillant success of the show. Her efforts are unflagging and sprightly, and her gurgling, rippling laugh, her sweet voice and vivacious manner are a combination irresistible. No daintier or more entertaining little woman ever trod the Columbia boards.

A musical critic in one of the cities where Patti recently sang has gone deeply into the psychology of song and of the ever-young Adelina's singing. He writes: "Her singing of 'Home, Sweet Home' simply baffles description. It is the reproduction of home to every person who ever had one, and a creation to those so unfortunate as not to know the meaning of the word. Without her own home feeling, even Patti herself could never sing it as well as she does." —The Playgoer.

Half Price Holiday Sale

The prices of imported Parisian Novelties astonished one at their lowness at the Vogue Cloak and Fur Co., 217 Grant avenue. Imported Millinery at half prices—Linen, Silk and Flannel Waists at less than Paris cost, likewise Neckwear and Belts—never have genuine articles been sold so low-priced before.

In Financial Circles

Business on the Stock and Bond Exchange remains stagnant. Transactions during the week were few and far between, and prices varied from one to two points on the smallest sales. What is the matter?

Gas and Electric on the financial showing ought to be considered an attractive investment. Miscellaneous stocks, such as California Wine Association and Alaska Packers', yielding a steady and reliable income, should not be neglected.

Sugar stocks are approaching a dividend basis and certainly deserve more attention.

The savings institutions have declared a higher rate of interest to depositors this year. The Eastern financial unpleasantness seems to be overcome, but what is the matter here?

Transactions amounted to $131,000, bonds, and 1,888 shares, divided as follows: 485 G. & El., 585 S. V., 137 Miscellaneous, 111 Bank shares and 570 Sugar.

—The Financier.

Mr. O. F. von Rhein of the Von Rhein Real Estate Co. says that almost every week old real estate men will be met by expressions of regret from some of their clients that they, the clients, did not heed years ago the advice of their brokers to make investments which by now have doubled in value, and a few years from now the clients of today will regret that they do not purchase at present values because no investment of stocks, bonds, securities of any kind or nature presents such absolute certainty of security coupled with certain and rapid growth.

Music

Not for some years have so many fine musical attractions, of a concert nature, been chronicled in the annals of San Francisco as those that came under the head of 1903. We had symphonies given under Scheel, Steindorff, Mascagni and Zech. We had Mascagni directing his own compositions at the Alhambra and at the Tivoli. We had Zelie de Lussan in song recital and opera. Kocian, Gabrilowitch, Hambourg, Olive Mead the violinist, Dolores-Trebelli, Mantelli, Nordica, Katherine Fisk and the Duss orchestra from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, Denis O'Sullivan and Andrew Bogart, our gifted native sons, in recital, Rose Relda, Eugene Cowles, the Coronation Choir, the Kilties from Canada, Edward MacDowell, our American composer-pianist, a production of "The Messiah" at Trinity, the Italian Band under Rivela and Chiaffarelli, Wenzel Kopta, Waldemar Lind and other good things. Manager Will Greenbaum added to the Alhambra the new Lyric hall, where many admirable musical attractions were given. The Tivoli had a revival of Gilbert and Sullivan operas, and a very artistic grand opera season in which "Zaza" and "La Tosca," both new operas to us, were given. The new year will bring us Patti.

One of the events that caused comment all over the world was the retirement of Grau from the grand operatic field, to be succeeded by Conreid in the management of the Metropolitan Opera House. The death of Sybil Sanderson caused sorrow on two continents.

The Minetti Orchestra gave its first concert of this season on Monday evening at the Alhambra. The audience was large and was evidently deeply interested in the program. The Minetti orchestra is an aggregation of amateurs, many of whom are very young. Taken as a whole, the performance was surprisingly good, and showed a degree of smoothness only to be attained by hard study and faithful practice. In the "Saul" overture of Bazzini which opened the program, Mr. Minetti showed that he had his players well in hand, and the military climax of the selection was well worked up, the violins coming in for some warm work in the finale. The first two movements of the Beethoven Symphony No. 1 went very smoothly, a little ground being lost in the allegro. The Godard suite for twelve violins and two harps was a pleasing feature of the program, and the "Tannhauser March," given in good style, formed an admirable close for a well selected musical menu. The soloist was Albert Elkus, the young pianist, who offered two of his own compositions and a Liszt number, "Saint Francis walking on the waters." Young Mr. Elkus is a player of power and intelligence, and his performance received an enthusiastic reception. Taken as a whole, the concert was a decided success, and both the director, Mr. Minetti and the orchestra should feel encouraged in their efforts. Such organizations as this do much to further the cause of good music, and to furnish ozone for that musical atmosphere which is so much talked about. Giulio Minetti acted as director; Rocco Laraja was concert-master; harpists, Miss Paula Wolff and Madame Alexandra Marquardt.

Mrs. L. Snider-Johnson's song recital was one of the interesting events of last week. Mrs. Johnson is a beautiful woman with an effective stage presence and an agreeable natural voice. Her most successful numbers were the two song-groups by Old English and modern composers. In these she was well within her vocal capabilities, and she showed charming taste and expression in her renditions. She also came out well in the Freischutz aria. She was hardly equal to the heavy dramatic work required in the Tschaikowsky selection, nor was she quite herself in the Von Fielitz song cycle which opened her program. Mrs. Johnson's voice is one which owes more to nature than to method. It shows some thickness in the lower notes and a little forcing on the upper. Her natural taste and intelligence, however, enable her to produce a generally agreeable effect, and she has none of those mannerisms and facial distortions which often mar a singer's performance. She was assisted by Dr. Stewart, who accompanied, and by the wonderful Kathleen Parlow, who drew forth some of her most witching tones in Max Bruch's "Swedish Dance" and Wienjawski's "Souvenir de Moscow," in which appears a haunting strain of the old air, "The Red Sarafan."

A special musical service will be held at St. Dominic's church tomorrow evening, when Saint-Saens' Christmas oratorio, "Noel," will be rendered by the choir. This remarkable work is one of the most beautiful compositions by the great French musician, and represents the highest type of modern church music.

The first concert of the Brodea Quartet, an organization consisting of Ingeborg Larsen, first soprano, Anne Crusoe, second soprano, Aldanita Wolfskill, first alto, and Edith Scott Basford, second alto, with Genevieve Farnsworth Wright, director and manager, was fairly well attended by a representative musical audience. The generous applause was justly bestowed, for the voices are all of fine quality, well-trained individually. The concerted numbers went surprisingly well. Dorothy Pasmore, who assisted in the program, played Popper's difficult Spanish dance, "Vito," with surprising tone and technic, and in the "Berceuse" by the same composer her 'cello sang most tenderly. Later her sisters, Mary and Suzanne, played with her the celebrated "Hungarian" trio by Haydn, and as an encore the Hungarian Dance in G minor, arranged by H. B. Pasmore. The little artists were very heartily applauded. The Brodea Quartet, by the way, will be heard at a larger affair to be given next month.

The honors of last week's concert of the California Conservatory recital belong to Miss Lydia Reinstein. This young lady is a brilliant and forceful player with a dash and vivacity all her own. Her numbers were a Glinka aria, a Rubinstein Staccato Etude, and later in the evening the Liszt arrangement of some of Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream music, including the well-known Wedding March. Miss Reinstein's beautiful, clear runs and trills were a delight to hear, as pellucid as water-drops. Miss Amy Peterson ran her a close second in point of excellence, her renditions being thoughtful and scholarly, and her performance marked by care and finish. She opened the program with a Bach-Liszt organ fugue in A minor, and closed it with the Liszt Campanella and a Rubinstein Valse Caprice. Miss Ruth Austin had the first movement of a Scarlatti Sonata and the Third Ballade of Chopin. She gave a very pretty interpretation of the latter work, with no hint however of the lurking devil which somebody—is it Huneker?—says it contains. Miss Bessie Griggs is a very little miss, whose careful rendering of a Bach Prelude and Raff's Spinning Song gave promise of still better work in the future.

THE TECHAU TAVERN.

A Few Facts Concerning Our Model and Popular After-theatre Cafe.

San Francisco is famous the world over for her after-theatre cafes, where people of wealth and leisure, the lover of music as well as the bon vivant, the connoisseur in all that contributes to the pleasures of life, the women of fashion and the men of the clubs love to congregate. Foremost among the cafes for which this city is famous is the Techau Tavern, that sumptuously appointed resort with the picturesque interior, in Mason street, to which all roads appear to lead when the theatres disgorge their throngs. Every night in the year there is to be witnessed in the Techau Tavern a scene of gayety, a glad commingling of the light-hearted elements of the community, a picture radiant with the joys of living. It is there that the Comedie Humaine is to be studied in all its phases. But the Techau Tavern is no place in which to ruminate or to philosophize. It is there that people go to discuss the choicest viands as well as the latest topic of interest, to the accompaniment of the lively and inspiriting strains of an orchestra, whose leader, in addition to being a skilled musician, is also up-to-date, and ever ready to invoke sweet strains from the latest musical comedy success, or to respond to the tastes of the patrons of the house.

The Tavern is the most completely appointed establishment of its kind in the city. It is not merely an after-theatre cafe. It is a restaurant whose management prides itself on the skill of its chef and on the quality of the contents of its larder, as well as on the excellence of the service. It is the resort of the epicure, for the fame of its cuisine is widespread. It is the aim of the management to cater to all appetites and the success that has been attained is evidenced by the popularity of the house. It is now easily the leading restaurant and family resort in this city, and so greatly has its business increased of late that it has been found necessary to increase the capacity of the main dining-room, which, by the way, is the most artistically decorated, best lighted and most perfectly ventilated in San Francisco. There is no other restaurant in the city whose main dining-room is so well adapted for the accommodation, on short notice, of a large party. The Techau Tavern has a private banquet hall, too, but theatre-parties prefer the main dining-room with its scene of gayety and splendor, and its surpassing service.

On the whole, the Techau Tavern is complete in all the details essential to the comfort and pleasure of its patrons. It is the cafe par excellence of San Francisco. It is a triumph of enterprise and sound business judgment

Review of the Realty Market

BY D. M. FRASER.

When I reviewed the condition of the real estate market for the year 1902 I said, in part, that the outlook for a steady market for the present year was never better. There was little or no speculation indulged in during 1902. On growing business streets, where suitable improvements had been erected, good tenants were secured at fair rents long before the completion of the buildings. The year 1902 was the banner year in real estate sales since 1867, the aggregate figures reaching a little over $47,000,000. The present year promises to be a close second.

Following are the figures, in round numbers, in millions, for each year since 1866: 1867, 17; 1868, 27; 1869, 29; 1870, 15; 1871, 12; 1872, 13; 1873, 12; 1874, 23; 1875, 35; 1876, 24; 1877, 18; 1878, 15; 1879, 10; 1880, 14; 1881, 12; 1882, 15; 1883, 16; 1884, 13; 1885, 14; 1886, 15; 1887, 20; 1888, 25; 1889, 34; 1890, 37; 1891, 27; 1892, 20; 1893, 13; 1894, 14; 1895, 17; 1896, 12; 1897, 12; 1898, 10; 1899, 15; 1900, 19; 1901, 29; 1902, 47.

As the settled business portion of the city becomes covered with modern buildings and prices reach a comparative maximum there will be a natural inclination on the part of buyers to purchase on prospective business streets as near the business centres as possible. Our wholesale, retail and banking districts will extend.

There is nothing to indicate a boom in real estate. On the contrary a healthy condition prevails and the advance in values is on a solid basis, backed by an advance in rents in all business sections. Our population is increasing rapidly and the city is advancing commercially and not on speculation. Real estate brokers are sanguine that the coming year will be an active one and in support of that view they have expressed themselves as follows:

Baldwin & Howell: "In addition to several large transactions closed during the year by this firm, the subdivision of several blocks of land south of Golden Gate Park, known as Parnassus Heights, was a notable achievement. The sale of a large portion of the land in lots under the hammer was very successful. In San Mateo, also, many sales of villa lots were effected by the firm."

Thomas Magee & Sons: "On the whole the tone of the market is good. A comparison with the stock and bond market either here or in the East and the outlook here is all in favor of investments in real estate. Many large holders of stocks and bonds are now turning from these securities to real estate for investment. The real estate market for 1903 has been a good one in spite of the uncertainty attending the erection of buildings, and the outlook for the coming year is very promising."

Madison & Burke: "It is not necessary for San Francisco to become greater than New York or London to cause an active real estate market here. If we only double our population in the next decade real estate values will be vastly increased in most parts of the city. The possibilities of San Francisco can be judged by what has occurred in other great cities of the Union."

Lyon & Hoag: "It would not be very surprising to find the local real estate market advancing very sharply after the holidays. As a rule the market during the latter part of this month has been quiet but this year is an exception and it has maintained that buoyancy which characterized it throughout the year. We have had a very successful year, principally in the subdivision of large blocks."

O. D. Baldwin & Son: "It would not be surprising to find the local real estate market very active in 1904, if the present excellent market is any indication. The year now drawing to a close has been wonderfully active considering that prices advanced sharply from time to time. The volume of business transacted by the firm this year has been the largest in its history—some of the deals reaching into the hundreds of thousands."

Nelson, Johnson & Co.: "Our trading in real estate for the past year has been very satisfactory and we look forward to a large increase in 1904. The effect of the building of the Panama Canal on San Francisco real estate will be stimulating, and we believe that prices for all classes of real estate will be maintained. The holiday season is usually dull in realty circles but this year is an exception and business has been good."

Ganco, Gunz & Co.: "We have just started in the business of trading in real estate, rentals, insurance and investments, and so far our business has reached a stage much in advance of what we anticipated. The splendid outlook for an active market in 1904 convinced us that now is the proper time to enter into the real estate business and secure one of the best locations in San Francisco to carry it on."

P. Rothermel of the Company bearing his name said: "The year just closing has been a prosperous one in the real estate business in this city and in the counties. In the face of a healthy demand investors used excellent judgment and the bulk of trading was confined to the wholesale district, south of Market and east of Second, and to other favored portions of the city, notably the neighborhood of Union Square. Country lands are in excellent demand and the outlook for 1904 augurs well for a brisk market."

R. D. Cranston & Sons: "In spite of the holiday season, which usually causes a lull in the realty market, the demand for both business and residence property, well located, continues without interruption. The tone of the market seems exceptionally healthy and the prospects for continued prosperity in the new year are indeed bright. In the vicinity of Golden Gate Park, hundreds of beautiful homes and pretty flats are being erected and this section is fast becoming the garden spot of our city."

Thomas James Stanton & Co.: "There has been an excellent demand for all classes of property during 1903, and we predict a continuance of that activity during the coming year. The rain has come in copious quantities and the prospects for a good year for the farmers are bright. This, taken in connection with the enthusiasm which the Panama Canal will undoubtedly cause, cannot fail to usher in 1904 a banner year in the history of the San Francisco real estate market."

"Why didn't you bring your wife with you, Mr. Gay?" asked Miss Flirty, at the Shekels's Christmas bal masque.

"Oh, you know when I married her I promised never to do anything that would make her unhappy."

And then he hied himself to the conservatory with his fair companion.

A Remarkable Growth

Such is our purpose of introducing to those of our readers who do not yet know of it personally the story of one of the swiftest successes which it has ever been the lot of a young merchant to achieve. It reads almost like a story of a creative cyclone, if such a thing could be, instead of the narrative of a peaceful business career. Founded in one store four years ago; today occupying five; four neighboring stores absorbed in four years, one in each year of the existence of the house! Four years ago, 10 assistants, now a staff of over 150; 4 years ago a beginning, today a regular clientele of over 5,000 customers. Such is the San Francisco record of R. D. Davis, head and sole proprietor of the well-known dry goods house of R. D. Davis & Co., of Grant avenue and Geary street, San Francisco.

Mr. Davis was born in Guelph, Canada, in the year 1867, but he came to this country and State when yet a lad, in 1884, and thus, although we can not quite claim him as a native son, we can very nearly do so, for at least all his business training and experience have been gained within our borders, and the pride of his success is ours as well as his. As with all geniuses, whether literary, artistic, or commercial, it is impossible to describe in detail just the qualities which, in their aggregate, have wrought the things which have been achieved; but that a very exceptional combination existed in the subject of our sketch is patent in the fact that, when still only just freshly into manhood, and scarcely, it might be said, more than out of his teens, he was invited into and made the active manager of the Sacramento house which became the firm of Wasserman, Davis & Co. And the judgment of Mr. Wasserman in securing the association of Mr. Davis in his business was abundantly proved by the result. Left in absolut and sole control, in very few years Mr. Davis built up one of the best and most successful businesses in California. But with the nervous energy which is so characteristic of him, he soon found the limits of the field he stood in, and realized that there was something ahead of him which was beyond the bounds of Sacramento. Like all conquerors, he began to yearn for fresh fields of victory, and so, in 1899, he came to San Francisco. And the result, up to date, has been indicated above.

The occasion of this notice is the opening of the latest addition to the store on Grant avenue, immediately north of the old frontage, and Mr. Davis is to be heartily congratulated upon the very pleasing effects which have been attained. Inside and outside alike, the new store is certainly one of the handsomest in the West. The windows and the interior fittings are all of solid mahogany, and are of very richly effective design, giving a feeling of comfort and roominess which is unfortunately very seldom found in modern stores, where everything seems to be sacrificed to the display of goods. Thousands will see and admire the new windows, and the admiration excited by the artistic view will only be increased by a visit to the interior.

To insure the success of the Christmas punch make it of Chapin & Gore's whisky.

Removal Announcement

California Business College takes great pleasure in announcing to the public that on the first of the year it will move to its new home, the fourth floor of the elegant building of the Pioneer Automobile Co. at the corner of Golden Gate avenue and Octavia street, just opposite beautiful Jefferson Square.

We will occupy the entire top floor, extending 145 feet on Golden Gate avenue and 125 feet on Octavia, covering 18,000 square feet. This will give us a larger floor surface than that of any other two business colleges in San Francisco, and larger than any other college west of Chicago.

Our location is an ideal one for business college work; removed from the noise and strife of business centres into a quiet, refined, aristocratic residence section, within three blocks of the centre of population of the city, and readily accessible to all parts of the city by direct connection and transfers.

Our large space is to be fitted up with glass partitions dividing halls and rooms. In fact, in the skylights, windows and partitions there will be over 10,000 square feet of glass, which will make our college literally a palace of light.

The health, convenience and comfort of our students have been considered paramount in everything, and we congratulate ourselves that we have the most delightful and inspiring place for business study that exists on the coast.

Every modern convenience to facilitate our work will be introduced, and all departments reorganized and refurnished, to the end that we may give our students the very best possible instruction in every branch of a business education.

REMOVAL REDUCTION OF 25 PER CENT

We move into our new home with 400 students, but as our quarters have been more than doubled, we want to double our enrollment. We want 800 students, and in order to increase our enrollment at once, we are offering the following liberal reduction in rates during December:

25 per cent. discount on Cash payments.

15 per cent. discount on Installment payments.

These discounts will positively and absolutely be discontinued on our removal. It is only a special discount for a special purpose.

This will give you the best education at the greatest business college in the West at the lowest rate in the market.

Write at once for our 75-page illustrated catalogue, telling the whole story. Come and grow with us.

William K. Vanderbilt declares that his ambition is to make a new world's record at one mile. The record is 46 seconds, made in France. The American record is 51 4-5, made by Henri Fournier, over the Coney Island boulevard course.

It is said that the day of the motorphobe is passing. Popular prejudice has ever been aroused against inventions that revolutionized conditions, and the protests against the motor were no more emphatic than were those against the locomotive engine in the days of its infancy. But the law of the survival of the fittest applies to human inventions as well as to the animal species. An era of toleration and fairmindedness toward the automobile has set in. The motor is no longer regarded as an engine of Satan.

The Brownlow Bill for National Aid in Road Building which has been introduced in the House has special claims not only on the support of motorists but on all others who are anxious that this country should have as many good roads as are consistent with its wealth, area and population. The bill provides for an appropriation of twenty-four million dollars to be used as a fund for national aid in the improvement of highways. No State can secure any part of this fund without raising an amount equal to the share demanded. Brownlow expects to have the bill passed by this Congress.

The Mobile Carriage Company's salesroom has been the centre of interest of enthusiastic automobilists during the past week. The Pierce Arrow touring car has arrived and it is considered the most stylish car yet seen on the coast. The tonneau and general outline of the car is "Frenchy" in every detail. While it has seating capacity for five people and an engine of 25 horsepower American standard (16 h. p. French) and a speed of 60 miles, the car weighs only 1,650 pounds.

Mr. James Waters, a banker of Watsonville, has purchased a Northern runabout, which he ran from San Francisco to his home, a distance of one hundred and thirty-two miles. The run from Oakland to San Jose, 54 miles, was made in one hour and fifty-five minutes; from San Jose to Gilroy, 32 miles, in fifty-six minutes. The trip was made over the San Juan grade and the whole distance was covered in a little over five hours.

Frank E. Hartigan, manager for the Mobile Carriage Company, has gone to Los Angeles to open a branch house at that point, where the same line of cars will be handled as in San Francisco.

Charlie Graham, Barney Oldfield's companion who rides the Bullet No. 3, is in San Francisco for a few days. He says he liked the Western metropolis so well that he returned here to take a little rest. He is very enthusiastic over the treatment received by Barney and himself while in California and says that the records made by the Winton racing cars will be held on this coast for many years to come. Mr. Graham thinks that the climate of California is especially adapted for fast driving with automobiles and says that the track in Los Angeles, were it fifteen feet wider, would unquestionably be the fastest track in the world. He said that the Empire City track in New York, on which Oldfield made his previous records, would not compare in any way with the Los Angeles track. He hopes to return here next year with Oldfield.

As for Oldfield's records, 55 flat is what his record for a mile will probably be. The records established on the third day of racing in Los Angeles will probably not be accepted by the American Automobile Association, which has undertaken the control and regulation of the sport in this country. Sanction was given the Automobile Club of Southern California to run practically an unlimited meeting, because it had no dealers in it, but a leading officer of that organization states that the meeting on Sunday was not under its sanction. Of course, to those who saw Oldfield's splendid performance in breaking three records in one day, the necessity for the recognition of a self-constituted authority does not seem apparent.

The horse as a first aid to the injured in the medical profession is rapidly going out of fashion. The automobile is being substituted by all up-to-date medical men, and it is predicted that after awhile, when you see a doctor riding behind a horse to the homes of his patients, you will be justified in concluding that he does not keep up to the times in his profession. There is a medical man in Oakland—Dr. N. H. Chamberlain—who has a stable of machines. He has had two automobiles for quite awhile and he lately bought a White Stanhope.

Mr. J. J. Spieker, who resides at 2100 Devisadero street, this city, recently returned from a trip around the world and this week purchased a handsome big Winton touring car. Mr. Spieker while in England and France devoted some attention to a study of the rivalry between American and French builders of the large touring cars. He states that much to his surprise he found a great many Winton touring cars in Paris. This certainly speaks well for American built cars. France, the home of the automobile, is fast losing its hold.

The autoists of Alameda county are still having trouble with the automobile ordinance. It is now proposed to allow the machine to run at twenty miles per hour, just double the present limit, and permit the chauffeur to pass a frightened team at the rate of six miles if the driver holds up his hand but once. If he holds it up twice the machine must come to a full stop. The auto, it is said, will also be required to take the outside on all mountain roads when passing a team.

A franchise for an automobile line from Wasco, on the Santa Fe railroad, to Paso Robles, in San Luis Obispo county, on the Southern Pacific Coast Line, has been granted to the Overland and Traction Company, a corporation of Bakersfield. It is the intention to carry freight as well as passengers daily between Bakersfield and the coast, making close connections with the Santa Fe at Wasco.

Mrs. Victor M. Clement, who is spending the winter at the Palace hotel, has purchased one of the latest style Winton touring cars from the Pioneer Automobile Company. This vehicle, with its special trimming, is one of the handsomest modern chariots on the Pacific coast. While the visitor has been in possession of her car only a few days, she has already become a very enthusiastic automobilist and uses her machine daily.

When in the East a few weeks ago, Mr. Larzalere of the Pacific Motor Car Company secured the services of Mr. F. R. Dorman, who has for several years been in charge of the offices and garage of the American company of New York and Cleveland. This company has also contracted with Mr. Geo. Sohner, of Cleveland, to take charge of its machine shops. Mr. Sohner for three years has been the Packard Motor Car Company's expert repair man, traveling to the various Eastern cities to repair and generally overhaul the old machines owned by this company's patrons. The Pacific Motor Car Company has installed considerable new machinery, and has just made many improvements in its garage and shops at 49 to 53 City Hall avenue. Specifications and photographs of the new Model L four-cylinder Packard have been received by the company. This is a very high-powered car, weighing 1,900 pounds; on the strength of the invention of many new and superior features embodied in this car, the Packard company has built and completed the largest auto factory in America at a cost of $1,100,000. Orders have been booked for the first carload, which will arrive about January fifteenth, and the sample car will arrive by express about January first.

An inspection of Model L will instantly draw attention to its simplicity. To the veteran in automobiling, this will instantly suggest such life and action as has never before been presented in an American automobile. The Packard Company's engineer recently returned from a European trip, and states that of the fifteen thousand motor cars in Paris, over 70 per cent are of the type of voiture legere, averaging one horse power for every 100 lbs. of loaded weight, and that the heavy touring car is being rapidly superseded by its lighter and more nimble brother. Our Model L has one horse power for every 85 pounds of loaded weight, and is ahead of the most advanced European practice. The price of this car with standard equipment, is $3,000. the wonderful progress made in the development of the automobile industry, and also to the practicability of the machine. Hardly eight years have passed since the first automobiles were made in this country, and from machines with a speed of ten or fifteen miles an hour we have developed machines with a speed of sixty or more miles an hour, and we are promised a still higher speed in the coming year. The steam engine running on steel rails took about forty years to reach the speed and comfort that the automobile attained almost in a jump. In the New York-Pittsburg run there were thirty-four entries and of these twenty-three finished. This is a most wonderful performance in face of the fact that the roads were, in a great many cases, worse than no roads at all. In some instances the bridges were washed away, in others the roads were covered with water and turned into miniature streams. In several cases the contestants were forced to take to the railroad embankments to get along at all, and some drove over the ties, yet twenty-three machines finished in good shape. Among the cars best known on the Pacific coast which finished within the required time and received notices of merit and the number of points that each lost out of the possible three thousand were the following: Toledo, 10; Pierce, 15; White, 6; Packard, 16; Rambler, 18. Among the other wonderful performances of the year was that of the Columbia, which covered one thousand one hundred and seventy-seven miles in seventy-six hours from Chicago to New York.

Recent purchasers of the White cars are Ralph Moore of the Spreckels Sugar Company, Dr. N. H. Chamberlain of Oakland, W. B. Glidden of Fruitvale and John H. Spring of Berkeley.

The practicability of the motor for all purposes, and especially in business, is becoming more and more apparent. The auto-delivery wagon is now in general use in the East. All the big houses have done away with their horses and their attendant hostlers and stablemen. The verdict is that the auto is cheaper, cleaner and faster. And for private use it involves less labor. When your trip is over, so is your work.

The National Company has two carloads of Knox's en route from the factory. This company, by the way, has given its Southern California agency to Norman W. Church, one of the largest dealers in Los Angeles.

White Sewing Machine Co.,
300 Post St.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Gentlemen,

I have been hoping to see some one from your office for some time, to exchange experience with on operating a steam carriage; but by reason of my being too busy to write you for pointers, my son, Paul (a High School student), has in the meantime blossomed out to a full-blown expert, and when you are in need of pointers he can supply them.

We have had your touring car three months, and after the first week have had no one to consult about the many little surprises beginners are apt to "run up against," as your agent here, Mr. Salbach, by reason of illness has not been accessible. But we kept the machine running from one-half to one hour nearly every day and on Saturday my son kept it busy about all day, and my wife and daughter have become fair amateurs in running it.

We have made several country runs of from twenty to eighty miles, punctured a tire once, broke the oil pump belt and had to hand-pump oil to the cylinders on one home run; ran through two and three miles of "sand blow" at a stretch, where every gasoline machine that tried it became stalled. We especially enjoyed one "sand blow" of about two miles "duration," as we were expected by several who dislike the auto, and they tried to dust us and then haul us out; but when the joke really dawned on our unsuspecting "denseness," we crossed in their front and to the wind which was setting a lively pace, and we gave them sand to take home as a reminder that no "sand blow" in the San Joaquin valley is of any importance to the White steam carriage.

My son and I started, November twenty-third, for a five days' quail shoot, taking our tent, and camping two nights. If you will look up records, you will note that we started on the heels of the big storm; all streams were comfortably filled. We went to the head of Hospital Canon in the mountains, forty miles distant from here. The last fifteen miles of the road had never seen an auto, and some of it showed no signs of having seen a wagon, and, in fact, discouragement for any vehicle was spread all over the boulders, driftwood, and several miles of creek bottom, where shifting sand, cobbles and drift were our only places for traction, as all other places were occupied, but we took possession with no one to dispute, molest or make us afraid, arriving at 7:10 p. m. What do you think of that? At the last house we left at the mouth of the canon at dusk we were told (had never been there before) that it was over ten or twelve miles to the Narrows (where we camped) and we could go no farther that night.

A man on horseback could not find it on a moonless night, but we were bound to be at the grounds for the morning shoot, and concluded, as we had two side lamps, when necessary one of us could take one lamp and go ahead and "spy out the land." We found the land scarce when we did the "spy act," but rocks, cobbles, sand and drift in magnificent liberality; but only two or three times did we dismount or retrace. At one point, we found our only retreat from a "jumping off place" was to back up a twenty-five per cent grade about sixty feet.

About half the run from home had been over the worst roads I have ever had the misfortune to travel. We had several miles of black adobe soil and had to rope the rear wheels to get traction, and with the rope wrapped around the wheels, in many places the wheels would spin around, skidding squarely across the road until a firm traction was reached, when we would recover our course.

The French Camp turnpike was also in bad condition. There had been heavy teaming over it coming from adobe roads on to the turnpike with wheels loaded with mud, which had picked up the gravel, entirely excavating through to the mud underneath large squares, in many places five to forty feet across the entire width of the roadway, and the mud therein would be hub deep, with a rise to the solid ground of a ninety per cent grade.

It was amusing to watch the surprise of the dozens of teamsters we passed (some of them apparently stalled), as they ignored our right to any of the road. My son has a snap-shot of a Stevens-Duryea being hauled out of a bog we laughed at, and by no means within fifty per cent as bad as some we almost swam through. My family all join me in thanking you for encouraging us in selecting a steam machine.

Very truly, (Signed) H. E. Williamson.

A Surprise

Beneath the mistletoe she stood,
A beauteous vision fair.

And stole behind her there.

She screamed as though afraid,
And he was much surprised to find
He'd kissed his fair one's maid. —The Butler.

Green Trading Stamps Are Popular

At our stores you may exchange them for your choice from thousands of premiums, consisting of furniture, silverware, china, and cut-glass, rugs, blankets, portieres, lamps, etc. The Green Trading Stamp Company has a $50,000 stock, the largest small-furnishing stock on the Pacific coast. The name "Sperry & Hutchinson" on a trading stamp is as good as the United States Treasurer's signature on a government bond. The leading merchants give Green Trading Stamps free when asked for them, one for each ten cents in the amount of purchase. The company has been established here for seven years and is backed by the Sperry & Hutchinson Company, Inc., whose capital is $1,000,000, surplus $100,000. More than $2,000,000 worth of goods were dispensed last year in premiums, and the volume of business increases day by day.

Our Connoisseurs Complimented

A French authority lately complimented Californians on their discrimination in the matter of wines, and spoke of the large importations of G. H. Mumm & Co.'s champagne into our State. "Mumm" has its widest vogue among the refined classes abroad, and it is an evidence of admirable taste on the part of Californians when they call for so much of it. The aim of Mumm's manufacturers was to produce a high grade champagne of pure properties, and their success has been demonstrated by the position Mumm holds among connoisseurs.

Fads and Fancies

Dearest Belle, New York, Dec. 12, 1903.

Holiday shopping is now in full swing in this great, big bustling and over-crowded metropolis, and it's a hard day's work to squeeze your way for an hour through some of the stores in the retail district. The crash in Wall street, whatever that means, is said to have sent an economical chill through the town, but it's all bosh. You wouldn't think so if you went into Tiffany's or any of the fashionable dry goods stores. You hear a lot about approaching hard times, but money seems as plentiful as ever. The theatrical managers have been complaining about not doing any business, and they blame the shortage in the box-office on Wall street, but the fact is the shows are bad. Some of them are the worst you ever saw. I have noticed that the good ones are playing to packed houses. Maude Adams, for instance, is turning people away.

I suppose you've heard about "Babe" Kemp's marriage with Hollis Hunnewell. It was a bold thing for "Babe" to do. You know Hunnewell is the worst roue that ever played havoc with the hearts and reputations of susceptible women. The ministers are all talking about the divorce evil again. By the way, I wonder what constitutes average married happiness. It seems to me that Elysium to one nature would be Purgatory to another, if not a veritable Inferno, and the point of view alters with each individual. Euphemistically speaking it is the polite thing to look at matrimony through rose-colored glasses, to prate about wedded bliss, the joys of home and all the rest of it—mere cant. For my part I don't blame Mrs. Hunnewell. Her first husband didn't treat her right. But I forgot—you don't want to hear a sermon—something about fashions, eh? Well, I can tell you about the very latest in bridal gowns, for I attended the marriage of Lillian Stokes Holmes with John D. Crimmins. Her gown was of white satin, chiffon and lace. The trained skirt was trimmed with two wide and one narrow fold of the satin, forming a deep border. The girdle, made of folds of satin, was extremely wide and over it drooped a fall of fluffy chiffon, above which was the point lace yoke and stock. The upper sleeves were also of point lace, with a fall of lace and chiffon at the elbows, and the point lace gauntlet lower sleeves ended in tabs over the back of the hands, no gloves being worn. A point lace veil, that had been worn by her mother at her wedding, was arranged so as to show her soft, low pompadour, and was caught with orange blossoms at the front and a diamond star at the back.

It may interest you to know that the new fashion, borrowed from the French, of dispensing with rugs in drawing rooms, or having only a very few, with highly polished floors and skins of animals spread about, is greatly in vogue. Stairways are now highly waxed and polished and many of them are without stair carpets. The result is that they are most dangerous to ascend or descend.

I was at the opera the other night, and I came to the conclusion that the tiara was going out of fashion. There were only three of those ornaments worn in the parterre boxes. I also noticed that pompons, and in a few cases natural flowers, were worn in the hair. The gowns were almost all white with here and there a rose or cerise shade, or some dark purple or claret-colored velvet.

I picked up some interesting information in the shopping district this morning. I learned that new materials for separate blouses include some very fine and sheer woolens in all-over embroideries in eylet-hole designs. These are simply made, and have silk slips of the same, or a contrasting color worn underneath them. Jeweled buttons matching the color of either the silk slip or the blouse are used on them. The new tailor-made gowns show the long-time favorite Eton jacket in all its numerous variations. Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, Jr., has one in a deep claret-colored cloth with a hint of heliotrope in its sheen. This is made with a clinging skirt that just clears the pavement and a close-fitting Eton coat that comes to the bottom of the waist, closed in front, and has a military collar. The costume is simply braided in black silk braid, perhaps three-fourths of an inch wide, that forms deep loops of graduated lengths running from the belt toward the hem.

I presume you haven't heard that one of the new customs is for the women to remain at table for the coffee. No longer do we have to go to the drawing-room while the men drink their coffee and cordials and smoke cigarettes. It is now our proud privilege to sit with them. This innovation, I suppose, comes from the fact that nearly every fashionable woman in New York smokes cigarettes.

Knowing that you have some coral heirlooms, I haven't any doubt that you will rejoice to learn that coral is again coming into fashion. Mrs. Orme Wilson introduced a great deal of it in her toilet at the opera on the opening night, and now everybody with old-fashioned coral ornaments is having them polished. So, be grateful. Sincerely, Francesca.

Court of the Palace Hotel as it Appears Today

Built though it was a quarter of a century ago the Palace Hotel is still the hotel par excellence of America. Its fame spread over the world long before people had an adequate idea of the resources of California, and it was pointed to as something unique by tourists who marveled that such a comparatively small city should have such a mammoth caravansary. The fact is that when the Palace Hotel was erected it was far ahead of its time, and today it stands as a monument of the enterprise and civic pride of its founders. But the march of progress has caught up to the Palace, not however that the management has been at a standstill. The fact is that it has kept pace with the most progressive developments in hotel accommodations in the largest centres of population, and today it is unsurpassed in its facilities for the comfort and entertainment of guests. In the last ten years over one million and a half dollars have been expended in improvements, and in the luxuriousness of its appointments it is without a peer in America. The most notable of the improvements that have been made was the metamorphosis of the big, famous court, which now includes a sumptuously furnished lounging room and a picturesque grill. This feature of the hotel is the source of wonder and admiration to people who have visited every large city on the globe.

A Studio Idyl

BY JOHN ROBERTS.

Tippon looked over at me, and behind the smile I fancied I saw a mist rising. She turned her head away quickly, and I politely returned to the exigencies of my maul stick.

"Tippon," I said at last, intently regarding my thumb through its opening in the variegated palette,—

"Tippon, do you know what day this is?"

The question was an absurdity, and we both knew it, but by tacit consent we waved the irony, and she canceled the question by an answer.

"Why, I believe it's Christmas," she returned indifferently,—just as though the three hundred and sixty-five days were of equal importance in the calendar. Then involuntarily she gave a little sigh, belying the calm of her demeanor, and hinting at an inner tumult of suppressed emotion.

There was a long silence,—and I had a suspicion that the brown-haired artist was furnishing brine for an innocent pastoral of Fontainebleau.

An exquisite sense of delicacy kept me from acknowledging the occupation of my colleague: the dual pastime of removing stray crumbs from an indignantly threadbare jacket, and the visual feat of taking observation from the corner of an inverted eye, fell to my lot. Finally there was a collapse at her end of the apartment, and a shower of brushes, large and small.

"Tippon," I cried in alarm,—"why, Tippon, what's the matter?"

She slid in a little heap to the floor, and, with face buried in her arms, was sobbing wildly; all effort at control vanquished by some inner picture of terrestial desolation.

I knelt down and firmly removed one hand, thereby disclosing a tear-stained face, highly ornamented by an unconscious daub of cobault on one cheek, and a mole of vivid green on the tip of the nose. Notwithstanding this unintentional tattooing, Tippon's eyes had never seemed so deep, so brown, so mysteriously sweet before.

She pushed me away shyly, and rose to her feet, putting the tumbled waves of her hair back with the feminine instinct which no grief can master.

"It was very silly of me," she said severely, "to give way like that, but no one seems to think of Christmas here, and somehow, my mind went back to home—and—well, I just couldn't help it," she added by way of apology.

The sun streamed in through the western window of the atelier, and slanted across the rows of empty easels, vacant, not because of the day's sacredness, but because Marcon had gone away at twelve, and without Marcon, the attendance was always slim.

I returned to my seat and sat down. Tippon began putting away her things hastily, and then reached up for her hat.

For the third time, I painted out the arm of a lusty peasant girl, my mind intent upon graver matters than fidelity to anatomical proportions. When Tippon was halfway to the door, I coughed in an insinuating manner, suggestive of delayed confidence.

She turned and hesitated, her eyes still soft with tears, her cheeks still flushed delicately.

"By the way," I said lightly, "will you dine with me tonight?"

I did not look up, but regarded my robust model critically. I knew by some subtle process of perception that she fluttered, looked startled and then smiled tremulously.

"Because you know," I resumed, relieved by the premonition that silence gives consent, "we might as well join forces and spend the evening together; no one knows us in this big, dreary Paris, and, suppose we have a little Christmas in our own way."

She came over and laid her hand gently on my arm.

"You are very good to think of me," she choked—and the mist threatened a downpour, which deluge I tactfully averted by rising to the occasion, and, flinging off my working coat, caught up my hat.

"Come,"—I cried authoritatively, "we will compose the menu at once."

Now Tippon and I had never broken bread together before, and, although I had the temerity to call her Tippon, as was the atelier habit of confreres in art, I had no idea of her abiding place.

The afternoon was mild with a warmth more akin to May than December, so we walked slowly in the direction of the grim barrack where I had my quarters.

Tippon never asked a question as we turned down a triangle of dirty rues, but with demure mien followed me silently.

I loathed the Latin Quarter with a fierce hatred, and bewailed the necessity which forced me to take this sweet little southern flower from the space and sunlight of the broad boulevards.

When I paused, she paused, and together we mounted the steep stairway that led upward to heaven—and my studio.

On the fourth landing she halted, and slipped a key to a door on the left.

"Won't you come in and rest a moment?" she ventured in a pretty embarrassment.

"What!" I exclaimed, "do you live here?"

"Didn't you know?" she said shyly.

I stammered out something in confusion, and meekly followed her into a wide, sunny interior, half studio, half living-room, and yet so dainty and sweet and clean that I blushed to think of my masculine, careless, pipe-strewn chamber above.

Some pigeons fluttered away from the window ledge, and a slender gold-rimmed goblet held some roses, while a half-drawn sketch leaned sociably against an inverted chair which did duty for an easel.

There was such a peaceful chasteness about the place that I gave a sigh of content, and sank down on the chintzy covered trunk in the corner.

"Tippon," I said gravely, "why did I never suspect this before?"

"Why, I thought you knew," she said innocently. "when you played Home-Sweet-Home last night, I cried myself to sleep."

"So my old violin made you homesick, too, child—and I never knew,—to think there was just a floor between two lonely beings," I meditated.

"But there'll be only a table between us tonight," she cried gayly.

The mellow twilight brought me to the sense of responsibility as a host, and springing up, I darted away to my own menage. I shook out my best coat, and a franc rattled to the floor. With a deep shame I realized my glaring poverty, and rushing to the cupboard, I saw with horror the remains of last night's supper.

I sat down stupefied.

Below I could hear Tippon's clear voice, running from a coon melody to a Christmas carol, her small feet pattering around in hasty preparation.

My bare studio grew dusky, and the pipes on the tray near by resembled little spades stuck in a clod of darkness.

"Oh, Jock!" Tippon called timidly.

How did she know my name, I wondered.

"Tippon," I said, manfully rising to my full height, "I cannot ask you to dine with me tonight, because—well—because one franc will only buy a bottle of wine,—and——"

Cutting my explanation short, she slipped a small hand into mine. "You are to dine with me, sir.—I think I refused your invitation."

"Why, Tippon—" I expostulated.

"Come," she commanded, dragging me after her.

Laughing, we stumbled down the narrow, gloomy stairs, and pushing me into her apartment, my hostess closed the door.

"Now," she said, with a dangerous light in her eyes, "you are my prisoner."

I stood fettered by my own surprise.

A table covered by a snowy napkin gleamed cheerfully under the weight of a clustered candlestick, a dish of goodly esculents, which proved to be a tempting array of lettuce leaves; a long beam of French bread, cheese, and a bottle of vintage, completed the magically ordered feast.

"Tippon," I murmured, shamefacedly.

"Jock," she whispered demurely.

"It was to have been my treat."

"Man proposes—" she sang airily.

"And woman accepts—sometimes," I retorted reflectively, whereupon she blushed and looked down.

"My franc must be expended somehow," I remarked.

"For the garcon," she said quickly, "we will give it to the concierge."

"Tippon, there is only one essential lacking,—and I think it is the mistletoe."

"And the turkey, and the pudding, and the mince pie," she laughed.

"Those are details, not essentials," I corrected, "details which entail a contented somnolence of the digestion, all admit, but they do not satisfy the heart, the soul."

She leaned back and looked over her glass in wicked satisfaction.

"But mistletoe has penalties all its own," said she.

"And a satisfaction which wipes out all debt. Now, Tippon, if I get my picture in the salon——"

"I am trying, too,——"

"Are you, Tippon? And if you do, child, what then?"

She smiled, and her lashes hid the sweetest brown eyes in the world.

"What then, Jock?" she echoed quizzically.

"What would you do then, Tippon?" I repeated, crumbling a piece of cheese in wasteful extravagance.

"I think I will go home,"—and her voice sank plaintively.

"Home, Tippon!" I cried blankly.

"Jock, Marcon told me Thursday that my picture was entered." She said it quietly, knowing intuitively the blow it would be to me.

I sank my head in my hands, and outside Paris—gay, relentless Paris, hummed busily.

"Please play me something," said she, penitently, after a long interval of silence.

I got my violin and ran over the strings mercilessly. She never flinched, but sat in the shadow, her hands folded, her glistening eyes on my face.

I rushed into Chopin, and then changed the movement with inartistic rapidity; finally pausing, I drifted into a low-toned melody, and then whispered off into the exile's sigh of "Home-Sweet-Home."

I forgot my one franc—Marcon's injustice—everything except Tippon and my own loneliness.

There was a cessation of sound below, and then a light footstep fell across my threshold.

"Don't, Jock," she pleaded with a sob, and then I knew that Tippon was crying.

I threw the violin down, and stood close to her in the shadow.

"Tippon," I said softly, "Tippon,——"

"Yes, Jock," she answered.

"I'll write the governor, and we'll both go home together, child."

She laid her brown head against my arm.

"Home, Jock,—home!——"

Then Tippon looked up and I gazed down, and then—there were some details which we could not see, for the candles sputtered and went out, leaving the studio in darkness.

A Plot for a Novelette

He kissed her beneath the mistletoe.

He loved her, but she did not know, for his kiss was tender, but not passionate.

He knew better than to show the quality of his love beneath the mistletoe.

She blushed. But when she thought it over, later, she concluded he meant nothing, that he did it to everybody.

He, in thinking it over, remembered the blush, but said: "It was an episode. She has forgotten it by now."

He did not know, but she treasured the memory of that kiss long after he had passed beyond her ken.

For he was a navy officer, and had a girl in every port. He loved them all alike.

Her deductions were right about the mistletoe kiss, but the result might have been otherwise had he followed up the act with one of deeper import.

This is but one of the many freaks Fate plays.

A Typical Grill

A Bohemian Club man, just returned from a visit abroad, was discussing the relative merits of European and American hostelries, much to the disadvantage of the former.

"Don't you think our cuisines are inferior to theirs?" was asked.

"Not at all," answered the traveled gourmet, "and our service is infinitely better. Why, the only two warm things I could absolutely rely upon getting in Europe were the ice water and the butter."

Improvements in San Francisco hotels are now the rule. The Lick House lately opened a grill room which added the crowning touch to the popularity of that always popular hostelry. Mr. George W. Kingsbury, proprietor of the Lick, has perfected every detail of service and appointment, in the manner of the up-to-date manager who personally supervises his establishment. The new grill is the acme of artistry in furnishing. It is the Old Dutch style, the seven-foot wainscotings of dark Flemish oak, the furniture and high-back cane chairs also dark-tinted in artistic contrast with the walls and ceilings of rich red. The grill holds one hundred diners comfortably. Its central location is an advantage. It has three entrances, one for ladies through the reading-room, for men through the office and a third from Lick Place.

"Christmas parties are awfully jolly,"
She said, flashing at him her eyes of blue,
"Don't you love the red berries with holly?"

Margot and the Poet

[Adapted from the French by Beatrice Hastings.]

Ah, what a dismal, disagreeable November evening it was! Through the mist the electric globes shed fitful gleams over the oily mud of the streets and boulevards.

Staggering along the sidewalk, knocking his shoulder, at times, against the shop windows, already closed, came a young man—scarcely twenty years of age. Those who passed him turned to look back at the slender, emaciated figure; others smiled contemptuously and passed on, taking him for a drunkard. The truth was that the youth had succumbed to hunger and fatigue.

Leo Bernis was born a poet. In early childhood he had given proofs of poetical genius. At the little seminary in his native village, where he had received gratuitous instruction in a smattering of Latin and Greek, he had figured as the indolent scholar who at times, through mere caprice, had surprised his masters, by rising above the leaders of his class. However, at seventeen he was refused his baccalaureate, because, forsooth, he could not give the exact dates of the Peloponnesian war, which revealed, of course, a lamentable lack of the indispensable knowledge required for the affairs of everyday life; nevertheless the old priest, an excellent humanist and as simple as a child, under whom Leo had studied rhetoric, predicted for his pupil, on bidding him adieu, a brilliant future in the literary world—for the boy had confided to the good Abbe his little book of April Poems, charmingly delicate verses, as fresh as almond blossoms.

An orphan, and free from the scholastic yoke, Bernis rushed to Paris, where he lived, as so many others live, on ideals, hope and bad charcuterie. Perhaps, some of these days, science will discover the peculiar properties of stale sausage and head-cheese, and disclose to the world the cause of its seeming tendency to promote elegaic inspiration and the production of sonnets—as most of our young poets have no other alimentation.

Once in Paris, Leo lost no time in presenting his manuscript to a famous publisher. Two months later he received a brief note from the literary critic of the house, praising his work and agreeing to publish his poems if Leo himself would bear the expense of publication.

The encomiums bestowed, though gratifying, did not in the least help him; for his daily maintenance still depended on a few ill-paid lessons and occasional mechanical work for publishers. Hence, he concluded to solve first the problem of his daily bread, before permitting himself to indulge in the luxury of a volume in Elzevirian characters, with ornaments and tail pieces. In other words, Leo Bernis found it hard enough to make sure of fragments of blood-pudding, or galantine, without elevating his thoughts to the height of breaded cutlets.

Extremely destitute, he led a pure and noble life. Ah! my dear and eminent confreres—writers, who, in the language of the day, have "arrived"—which one of us, sincerely, with his hand upon his conscience, does not regret the early days of his life, when, although he felt the pinch of poverty, he remained true to his dream of Art—Art that was pure and disinterested?

Meanwhile, the young poet's troubles increased. Publishers withdrew their work, pupils stopped their lessons, and the boarding school, where he had accepted the position of a dog, for food and lodging, closed its doors for lack of funds.

For three days Bernis walked the streets; at night he sheltered himself in partially demolished buildings, and on this cold and foggy November evening, when he staggered along the sidewalks, he had not eaten for fourteen hours—that is to say, since his first breakfast, which consisted of a roll and the inevitable sausage; and though he had not a sou in his pocket, he could still count on lodgings for that night, as a friend, almost as destitute as himself, and who had gone in search of work since early morning—the companion from whom he had borrowed the three sous for the roll and the inevitable sausage—had invited him to share his garret-lodging. But the lodgings were so far away! To reach them, he would be obliged to mount the steep hill of Montmartre. He had just come out of the Sainte Genevieve library, where he had spent the evening in order to keep warm. He had one hour and a half of walking before him. Think of it—one hour and a half of walking before he could enjoy the luxury of stretching himself out, with an empty stomach, in a miserable garret, on a pallet in a cheap lodging-house!

Hardly had he taken a few steps when he began to stagger. His legs trembled under him; his empty stomach growled; his temples throbbed; he felt incapable of proceeding farther; he was in despair.

Suddenly, from around the corner of the street, he heard a woman's voice, calling to him. Her voice was somewhat hoarse, but she addressed him, without undue rudeness, as she approached and whispered into his ear: "My handsome young blond, are you not coming to see me?"

Mechanically Leo turned and looked at the woman. She was a heavy, coarse brunette, no longer young, and considerably over thirty, for her hair was tinged with gray. She wore a dark stuff dress and a black cape, and might easily have passed for a workingwoman had not the touched-up eyes and rouged cheeks revealed the professional.

Bernis was an extremely moral young man, his life was pure and chaste; hitherto his loves had been confined to the golden-haired fairies of childhood and the princesses of his poetic dreams. The woman horrified him. He turned away from her and made a vain effort to hurry on. His strength failed him, however, and he was obliged to stop and lean against a wall for support. The woman clung to her victim. It was not easy to baffle her. She followed on, and when he stopped she said, half aloud to herself: "Well, I wonder what is the matter with him? Perhaps he has taken a drop too much."

As she joined Bernis she confronted him with the bold, brazen smile of a wanton. He was almost fainting. The cold perspiration moistened his forehead. "Leave me," he stammered. Instantly the expression in the woman's face changed; her brazen smile gave way to a look of sympathy and pity, as she anxiously asked: "Are you really sick, young man?"

Overcome with hunger, Leo actually lost courage and began to complain. Closing his eyes he said, wearily, "I have not eaten anything since eight o'clock this morning! . . .I am starving!"

He was not left to starve long, for this brazen woman of the street had a golden heart. With a grip of iron she seized him by the arm and pushed him into an adjacent alley, opened the door of a dilapidated house and dragged him into her own room, which was on the ground floor—a poverty-stricken room, with straw-stuffed chairs, a huge bed covered with a bright red eiderdown coverlet of cheap quality, and a round table on which burned a candle in a tin candlestick.

Completely unnerved from want and shame, Leo fell into a chair, and covering his face with his hands wept bitterly. The woman was touched with compassion; great tears streamed down her face, diluting the rouge on her painted cheeks, as she opened her cupboard, laid the cloth, and placed before her guest a long loaf of bread, a bottle of wine and a generous slice of cold veal, cooked in its own jelly.

Bernis tearfully stammered his thanks. "Do not fatigue yourself in talking; eat first," said she, in tones of deep respect, inspired by the young man's misfortunes.

The poet ate ravenously, while the woman, through delicacy and fear of embarrassing him, knelt before the hearth, stirring the embers under pretense of reviving the fire. Thinking that he might possibly hesitate to help himself a second time, she left the fire and once more served him plentifully with meat and wine, just as a mother would have waited upon her son. "Ah!" she exclaimed suddenly, "what a fool I am! For proper digestion one should have something hot. I'll make you a cup of coffee; it will do you good." Returning to the fire, she placed the coffee-grinder between her knees and began to turn the crank.

Leo now had an opportunity to observe more closely his charitable hostess. He noted that she was a woman of the lowest class—faded, worn-out, with a heavy, ungraceful figure, and the hands of a dish-washer. Had she ever possessed the wholesome charms of a tall, robust figure that comes from vigorous health, or the witchery and beauty of a Carmen? Hardly. Today she was sallow-skinned, bloated, with triple chin, and quite gray on the temples. Young Bernis, however, was a true poet, and destined later on to become a very celebrated one; so he looked at her tenderly, with brimming eyes, full of gratitude and thankfulness. And when she had poured the coffee, taking for herself a few sips, "just to keep you company," as she expressed it, he asked her name.

She did not respond immediately but stood, half embarrassed, on the opposite side of the table, with folded arms, evidently reflecting. At last she said:

"There is no particular reason why I should tell you my name. There never can be anything in common between a woman of my class and a refined, elegant little gentleman like yourself. Under the circumstances, what I have done for you is only natural—and there is nothing more that I would wish to offer you. Neither would you desire it. Today you are in adverse circumstances, but take courage! . . . You have youth, and that is a famous treasure. . . . What is your occupation, sir?"

Leo smiled rather bitterly. "I write verses," he answered.

"Ah, yes," she replied, without betraying the slightest surprise, "I understand, you compose songs. Have patience, and success will come. And if you really want to know my name—well, they all call me Margot. But if, by chance, you should ever think of me again, let it be as Marguerite—the name is so much prettier."

The woman stopped short and dropped her eyes. He felt that it was time for him to leave. But on the threshold of the door, as he was about to say good-night, profoundly touched at having discovered such gentleness and pity in the heart of this miserable creature, he conceived a golden idea—the inspiration of a poet. He took the hand of this woman—a hard hand and wrinkled, with dirty nails, the hand of servitude and shame—and stooping, he respectfully kissed it as though it were the hand of a royal queen.

The Ideal Mineral Water

The merits of Geneva Lithia Mineral Water have been so completely proved by experience and observation that no other arguments are necessary to attest its worth. It has been commended by scientists for its purity and its perfect adaptability to the digestive system. Physicians particularly recommend it for use in dyspepsia, gastric and internal indigestion attended with nervous prostration, general debility and anæmia, catarrh of the bladder, eczema, incipient Bright's disease, chronic albuminuria, diabetes, rheumatism, neuralgia, torpid liver and other diseases of the liver and kidneys. Joe Jefferson, W. H. Crane and Lieutenant Cosby, U. S. N., are among those who attest to Geneva Lithia's merits. The Geneva Lithia Mineral Spring at Geneva, New York, was discovered in 1886, and is now one of the best known and most highly recommended mineral springs in the world. The well of this remarkable spring is eight hundred and thirty feet deep, the spring proper being three hundred and five feet deep, lying between a layer of Medina stone sixty feet thick and a deep strata of hard slate. Over three hundred gallons daily are sent out to Europe and through the United States. It has lately been discovered that the Geneva water blends well with wine or whisky, and prevents the alcohol from fermenting in the stomach, or forming uric acid. It is well to remember that the genuine Geneva Lithia is always put up in stone or glass packages. The general offices of the company are at 20 Court street, Brooklyn, New York, the Western offices at 50 West Eagle street, Buffalo.

A Similar Case

BY BESSIE L. RUSSELL.

Grayson stretched himself full length upon the white sand and smiled at the ocean. He had long ago concluded that it was better to smile than to sneer, and so it was that the smile came to the front on this as on other occasions.

But then, why should he not smile on Christmas morning? Christmas, too, amid such naturally beautiful environment—Christmas beneath a California sky?

So far as nature was concerned, there was indeed every reason for joy, yet Allen Grayson was in no exactly Christmas mood. His mental state, in fact, was close bordering on melancholia. Of that temperament variously characterized as choleric, moody, capricious, he reminded those who knew him of a fitful April day. His smiles could change instantly to frowns. It was this unfortunate temper that had been the cause of his recklessly putting two thousand miles between himself and a charming young wife. Without taking time to think what such a rash step would mean to her, he had boarded a Chicago fast limited for the distant West. So it was that, naturally enough, the mood having spent itself, Allen Grayson was sorry enough. He regretted his haste. Leaving his position of lounging content (?) he paced restlessly the length of the beach that formed the frontage of one of California's most magnificent hostelries. He was about to retire within its inviting walls when another mood struck him. If he did that, he said, he would have to meet people, and people were so exasperating when one preferred solitude. People would pass the compliments of the day and drag him into conversation, when he (Grayson) was in no talking mood. So Grayson strolled on.

The coast at this point was monotonous enough, but farther on he knew it became cliff-like and the scenery, he had heard, was not to be despised. An oft repeated quotation ran through Grayson's head: "I like nature because she is a retreat from man," and Grayson reflected that his feelings were perfectly in accord with that sentiment. He found himself, before an hour had passed, on the edge of a precipice. What a risky thing it was, that rocky shore path. Why, the path was so narrow and steep, it required all his nerve to keep from falling. A child playing along this part of the coast would with no effort at all fall down into the hungry waves beneath him. A man,—great heavens, a man might walk—out of—all—his—troubles! But Grayson's soliloquy was interrupted by a brisk slap on his shoulder and a welcome voice shouting in his ear: "Grayson! I'll be bound if it isn't! Been here long?"

"Not very," said Grayson with an alacrity he did not feel.

"Like it here?"

"Fairly well," mumbled Grayson.

"Oh, but you will like it," said his companion cheerfully. "California is like olives, cigarettes and sauterne, you know. A first taste doesn't give you any idea of the article or what it's going to mean to you. It takes several indulgences to make you realize the hold it gets on you. Why, I wouldn't go East again for a fortune. Last Christmas, now—singular thing—I was here just as you are for the first time. I was trying to enjoy things, too, and would have succeeded but for that neuralgia of mine. It would keep me from sleeping. Now if there is one thing more than another to make a man utterly wretched, it is the knowledge that he is alone in his misery. That's the way I felt, when I awoke one morning at five instead of nine, and came out here to look at the dawn.

"I soon discovered that I was not alone. A woman emerged from the shrubbery—yonder—a woman, too, beautiful as an houri; clad all in black, she walked as one who has a sorrow to bear and who has decided not to bear it much longer. Fearing to intrude upon her grief, I kept concealed at a safe distance, yet near enough to hear her and see her distinctly. Plainly Creole, I marveled at her presence on this coast.

"'Oh, God!' she moaned piteously, 'it's hard when I love him so—so much and he so blind. How can it be that he doubts me, yet he does—he does! He believes it of me. Merciful heavens, that it should come to this—that it should——'

"I refused to listen more. I refused for a moment or two, but curiosity getting the better of me, I emerged from my hiding place and followed her along this shore path. The woman wore a gold cross about her neck and it was with this she fingered nervously as she continued her unhappy pace. Suddenly, with an alertness seen often in animals, but hardly ever in human kind, she rushed to this very point where we now stand, and with one mad impulse, dashed herself over to the waves beneath.

"I gave notice to the hotel people of my gruesome experience, but all search proved useless. The relentless sea had done to the limit.

"No one knew much of the beautiful Creole, save that she had registered the day before without luggage from New Orleans, and had left a roll of bills with the proprietor. By a strange freak of the waters, though, the gold cross was washed ashore. I found it next day on the beach. I have it now. 'Francine' is the only inscription."

What a thrill ran through Grayson as he listened.

"Excuse me, Jack," he said curtly, "I believe I'll beg off for a smoke."

But he didn't smoke. All the way back to the hotel, he worked it over in his own mind, the truth that had been brought so vividly home to him.

How similar the stories, he reflected. Francine—Frances! Creole beauty—Puritan belle,—and both sensitively wounded to the heart by one man's gross accusations.

How ruthlessly he had left her, his charming wife, left her stinging with the taunt of a jealous husband's unwarranted suspicions—she so innocent, he so blundering. "But I will not have it so," he cried desperately, "I will make amends. She may not go wild over my words as that poor other soul did; she may not jump into the sea to drown her troubles, but if I don't do something at once, her misery will be every whit as bad.

"I'll write her," said Grayson, which he did on the hotel's finest Marcus Ward paper.

"Darling Frances," he scrawled nervously, "forgive me, for I've been a fool. Your loving Allen."

"No, that won't do," he said with the next breath, "It's too vague and not at all explanatory." He wrote another then, beginning the epistle, "My Most Trusted Wife."

"Pshaw, that won't do, either," cried Grayson. "Why, I left her because I didn't trust her."

Then it was he quit running his hand through his yellow hair; quit chewing the end of his fifteen-cent-straight-Havana, and wrote rapidly, fearlessly, madly:—

"Once doubted but now forever trusted wife,

"I am crazy to see you! You bet I am! I don't know why I left you. I mean, I don't know why I didn't bring you with me. It's lovely out here, too, that is, it would be if I had you, Fan. The climate is so fine and exhilarating, that is, it ought to be and would be, other things being equal. And California is the only state to live in—provided, of course, you've got your family with you.——" That is as far as Grayson got. He thought of the distance that epistle would have to travel before it reached her, the precious darling. He remembered the time it took him to get to the coast and he shuddered at the thought. Four days of suffering for her, four days of suspense for him. No, Grayson could never stand that.

Then it was that the lightning-like business method of the man reared in Chicago asserted itself. He would wire her, he said. And amid floods of California sunshine this is what Grayson wired:

"Awfully sorry. Can't stay away. Leave for home by the Santa Fe tonight."

A Great Pleasure Resort

If not absolutely the best appointed place of amusement of its class in this country, The Chutes ranks with the finest, and to thousands of tourists who have seen similar places in the East, the San Francisco institution easily stands at the head. Great natural advantages in point of location, spacious accommodation and accessibility, a fine collection of rare and expensive animals for the menagerie and an immense theatre for the superior presentation of high-class specialty and variety attractions, combine to draw the patronage of all classes of sightseers or searchers for entertainment. The value of such a comprehensive place of amusement in a city where it may be kept open all the year round, must assert itself to all pleasure-seekers. The Chutes is a perfect paradise for children, and youngsters of a larger growth are not slow to take advantage of the opportunities for pure, healthy amusement offered at the popular resort.

Among the many interesting concessions on the grounds may be mentioned the wonderful sensational mile scenic railway, the bewildering and beautiful ride "Down the Flume," the humorously solemn "Cabaret de la Mort," the mysterious and puzzling mirror maze, the ever popular water chutes, the healthy, happy babies in the infant incubators, the galloping horses, Ferris Wheel, Little Lake Shore Railroad, limited, and "trip around the world." The cafe is a feature in which the management takes a justifiable pride, the best of luncheons and dinners being served at all hours at city prices. The chef in charge is thoroughly experienced and the best to be obtained in the market is served in delightfully appetizing style.

The fame of the Chutes "Amateur Nights" has spread all over the United States and on Thursday evenings the commodious, well-heated and comfortable theatre is always packed with a gleeful, happy crowd. Many young people who faced the footlights for the first time on these occasions have graduated into the professional ranks, and have achieved fame and fortune in their chosen life work.

The orchestra at the Chutes is one of the best in the city and the open-air concerts given every afternoon and evening by Casassa's Military Band are always thoroughly enjoyed.

The Year in the Navy

BY ARTHUR H. DUTTON.

By far the most important event of the year 1903 in the United States Navy was the plan adopted by Congress for remedying the dearth of commissioned officers in the service. The expansion of the fleet, which has been going on steadily since the close of the Spanish war, created a demand for officers beyond that which the existing resources could supply. Unlike the Army, the Navy has always been reluctant to increase its commissioned personnel by resorting to volunteers. "Mustangs" are looked upon askance, if not worse, by the conservative Navy.

The only logical recourse was to increase the number of graduates from Annapolis, and to this end the last Congress passed a law, which was approved March third, more than doubling the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy. Under the new law, which is to remain in operation for the next six years, each Senator, Representative and Delegate in Congress is to have two midshipmen at the Academy, in addition to which there are to be two from the District of Columbia and five per annum appointed at large by the President. Also, the infant territory of Porto Rico is to have one of its native sons appointed as a midshipman.

As a result of this great increase in the number of midshipmen, the Naval Academy now has within its walls a greater number of the embryo officers than ever before in its history. The fourth class alone has over 300 members, the first class has 65, the second class 122 and the third class 155. In addition to these, there are 106 midshipmen who have completed their four years' academic course, and are now performing the two years' service at sea on cruising ships, as required by law.

This method of supplying the wants of the service seems both simple and satisfactory, but it has its drawback. The particular thorn to the rose is the fact that it threatens the service in the near future with a "hump" more hurtful than that of thirty years ago, which brought baneful stagnation to the service, from which the latter was many years in recovering, if indeed it has recovered. This kind of sudden injection of young men, of approximately the same age, is going to disturb the flow of promotions for many years, and then, as the officers thus created wholesale grow old, there will be a tremendous scurrying through the higher grades at lightning speed, as whole blocks of them are retired at very nearly the same time. The service knows well the meaning of a "hump." What may be termed the "hump of 1903" promises to be worse than that of 1870.

For the two-fold purpose of adding to the commissioned officers, and at the same time furnishing an answer to the complaint that the Navy, unlike the Army, gives no opportunity to its enlisted men to obtain commissions, the latest order on the subject authorizes the commissioning as ensigns of twelve warrant officers per annum, to be selected from the boatswains, gunners and machinists, under the age of thirty-five, who may qualify by satisfactorily passing examinations prepared for them. This pretty little scheme looks well. As matters of fact, however, the twelve additional officers, if indeed, twelve are secured, that it will provide, will be but a drop in the bucket in the way of increase. On the other hand, say what one will, the fact remains that conditions in the Navy are such that the wardroom cannot be entered through the hawsepipes. The conditions within the confined quarters of a ship, with its human and social complexities, are very different from those in the Army. Even granting that a man may qualify morally, socially and professionally, as far as examinations go, there are still other acquirements which the layman does not appreciate, which the candidate from the enlisted officers, except in extremely rare cases, has no means of attaining. Chief among these is the "air of command." Though he may be of gentlemanly presence, of good technical education (which is doubtful), there will yet be that atmosphere of the forecastle about him, which sticks to the sailor with far greater tenacity than does the air of the private soldier to him of the Army. A striking illustration of the impracticability of promotion from the ranks in the Navy was furnished last year by the American manned Colombian cruiser Boyaca, most of whose officers were lifted from the ranks of the American Navy to lieutenancies in the Colombian, and placed as commissioned officers over the men with whom they had formerly associated on terms of equality. The experiment was an ignominious failure. However excellent they were as gunners, they had not the "habit of command," nor the control of the men that are beaten into the Annapolis man from the start, and only acquired by him after long years of arduous training.

Along with the increase of midshipmen at Annapolis, the recent law increased the numbers in various grades of the service. Lieutenant-Commanders were increased from 170 to 200, Lieutenants from 300 to 350. In the Staff Corps, there were increases of 5 Medical Inspectors, 25 Surgeons, 120 junior Surgeons, 2 Pay Inspectors, 36 Paymasters, 26 junior Paymasters, and minor increases in the Construction and Civil Engineering Corps.

The fleet manœuvres of the Navy will doubtless be carried on along more elaborate lines each year, as more vessels are added to the fleet. Those of last August, off the New England coast, were widely exploited by the uninformed representatives of the daily press, whose despatches might have lead nearly the whole country into the belief that we were defended by a powerful Armada, capable of coping with the most ponderous fleets of a foreign foe. As a matter of fact, the contending squadrons of the August manœuvres, although they were all that we could muster at that time in the Atlantic, were pitifully weak. There were only seven battleships, only four of which were up-to-date. One of them, the ancient Texas, was on her last legs, while the Massachusetts and the Indiana are obsolescent. Of all the rest of the fleet, the cruisers Olympia and Baltimore and the gunboat Newport were the only real vessels of war, and they were not of formidable type. The balance were merchant steamers, yachts, old wooden training ships, and the like, improvised into men-of-war, or, rather, considered men-of-war for the occasion. It is safe to say that a fragmentary flying squadron of the British or French navies could have whipped that entire outfit off the seas in one engagement. In commenting upon this aggregation, Admiral Dewey very truly said, for the benefit of the Navy League: "To the layman this would seem to make a formidable fleet, all large as [illegible] appears on paper. A list of non-homogeneous battleships and converted merchant-ship cruisers will deceive neither the naval expert nor the writer who makes a specialty of naval matters. It will be heralded to the world by ignorant journalists as a force able to cope with any fleet afloat, and a few of these irresponsible writers will think of comparing it with the evolutionary squadrons of Great Britain, France and Germany." The fleet mobilized for the December manœuvres in the West Indies is, happily, a better one.

It must be said that the present year has been marked by the introduction of a policy as new to our Navy of the last half-century as it will surely prove to be beneficial. This consists of placing the torpedo boat destroyers and torpedo boats under the command of young, energetic and daring officers, who are not only encouraged but directed to handle their boats boldly, and with as many nautical pyrotechnics as the exigencies of war might require. It is true that there were some mishaps during the year, but they were not serious. The Navy Department adheres to the belief that it is much better to suffer occasional damage to the comparatively inexpensive torpedo boats, than to damage permanently the self-confidence and enterprise of the officers who would be called upon to handle them in time of war. Beyond all, the dexterity acquired by these young officers in handling the torpedo craft cannot fail to be of immense value to them, later when, upon reaching the higher grades, they are placed in command of the larger vessels.

Speaking of mishaps, it is regrettable to note the fact that those of the past year have not been restricted solely to the torpedo flotilla. The battleship Massachusetts holds the record for accidents. On January sixteenth she had a fatal gun explosion, resulting in the loss of nine lives; on August twelfth she managed to strike a pinnacle rock off Bar Harbor, sustaining serious injury. The Olympia, also, came to grief from grounding. The new monitor Arkansas had her turret loosened by the recoil from firing her two 12-inch guns simultaneously—a mishap which the San Francisco-built monitor Wyoming did not suffer under the same conditions, but one of the guns of her sister ship Nevada exploded during the latter part of May in practice off the Delaware Capes, and did considerable damage. The converted gunboat Scorpion was slightly injured by collision with the steamer H. M. Whitney, in the East River, but it was shown that her commander was not to blame for it. Only one naval vessel has been lost during the year, that being the old tug-boat Leydon, which ran on the rocks at Block Island last January, but in August the tug Pontiac had a narrow escape, fire breaking out upon her as she was carrying one thousand tons of saluting powder to the Chicago, in New York bay.

The squadrons in foreign waters are to be congratulated upon being singularly free from accidents, and it is universally agreed, in and out of the navy, by all well-informed persons, that the service has done excellent work in the ordinary police duties of a navy at home and abroad.

The only new vessels of importance placed in command during the year, were the monitors Nevada and Florida, sister ships of the Wyoming, which were commissioned respectively on March 5th and June 18th, and the cruisers Tacoma, Cleveland and Denver which were put into active service this autumn. The submarine torpedo boats Adder, Moccasin, Grampus, Pike, Plunger, Porpoise and Shark, were all delivered during the year, as were the torpedo-boat destroyers Hull, Lawrence and Hopkins. There will be no more large vessels placed in commission, in all likelihood, before the spring. On the whole, the United States Navy is certainly increasing satisfactorily as far as numbers are concerned. Homogeneity of types is something to which more attention should be paid than in the past, particularly as regards speed. In order that we may obtain the naval establishment that the country's needs demand, it is only necessary that the present rate of construction should be maintained for some years to come. In other words, the country's welfare calls for a settled, well-defined naval programme covering a number of years.

The close of the year finds the position of the United States Navy, as far as ships go, to be as follows:

Of these it must be remembered that, however necessary the training ships, colliers and other miscellaneous vessels may be, the only strictly fighting ships are the battleships, cruisers, gunboats and torpedo craft. The others are merely auxiliaries to the ones that deliver the blows. Remembering, always, that the battleships and the armored cruisers are the backbone of the fleet, it may be seen that the United States Navy today, including vessels built and building, is no mean one. Indeed, it is the third in power among the navies of the world, but further additions are needed, to keep pace with the great construction programs of Germany and Russia.

John A. Benson

John A. Benson, the civil engineer and land agent, at 507 Montgomery street, is at the head of his profession on this coast. He is familiar with all the land surveys made by the government on this coast. For years he surveyed for the government and his lines are guides to go by when perfect titles are desired. It may appear strange at the first glance that the land office was not named in preference to John A. Benson. The land office people are so tied up with "red-tape," which is bound so tightly around them that they are too encumbered by its importance to be more than barely civil to the seeker for knowledge as to government lands, etc. One clerk refers you to another, and you come out of the place no wiser, though perhaps a trifle madder, than when you went in. Now, on the other hand, the inquirer at the offices of Mr. Benson will find that gentleman and his clerks uniformly polite and obliging. They know at once how to put their hands upon any plat of land desired, and will give you the benefit of their knowledge as to its fitness or unfitness for the purpose needed, and have in fact the whole state land business at their fingers' ends. The offices are equipped with the most reliable maps, surveys, etc., and a library of books relating to such matters can be referred to at will. It has taken Mr. Benson years of careful work to attain such perfection, but he has made it the object of his life. Mr. Benson can obtain title to any vacant, unappropriated lands of the United States, surveyed or unsurveyed, by means of Forest Reserve Rights, and other scrip. John A. Benson was born in Jefferson county, N. Y., and received his earlier education at the public schools. Here he was looked upon as a wonderfully apt scholar, especially in mathematics. He next attended the Warren Collegiate Institute of Illinois, from which he graduated with high honors, and at once adopted civil engineering as his profession. He was cut out for the work, and his friends, teachers and fellow-students watched his after career with interest, for they all agreed that John had the stuff in him to make a name for himself, and they were right. John A. Benson had no sooner attained his majority than he was elected surveyor of Keokuk county, Iowa, and held the position five years, till he arrived many years ago in this state—to meet with success from the start.

Commander Geo. W. Bauer

Naval Militia of California, commanding U. S. S. "Marion," elected Captain Commanding the Naval Militia of California on Saturday, October 17, 1903

Most men who win many honors and titles do so at the risk of injuring their popularity, and losing their friends. Jealousy and envy generally follow the career of a successful man. But in the case of George William Bauer, this axiom does not hold good. Though Colonel Bauer has attained more honors than usually fall to a man of his years, he is as popular as he ever was, and this is because he has retained his cordial, genial manner, and simplicity of demeanor, through it all. The latest honor falling to George William Bauer was that of Captain Commanding the Naval Militia of California and the U. S. S. Marion. Add to this his other title, Commander Alumni Commissioned Officers' Association of the University of California. Colonel, or Commander Bauer, has a military record of which any man may be proud. Six years ago he was Colonel of the regiment of University Cadets and when he graduated from the university in May, 1897, Governor Budd commissioned him and placed him on the retired list with the rank of Colonel. The officers of the University Cadets, be it known, rank with retired officers of the National Guard of California of the same relative rank. The rank of Commander of the Naval Militia of California, which Colonel Bauer now holds, is the same relative rank as a Lieutenant-Colonel of the Army. Divisions of the Naval Militia are stationed in this city, Santa Barbara, San Diego, Los Angeles, Eureka and Santa Cruz. Colonel Bauer is one of those generous men that win friends by thousands. He is a member of Excelsior Lodge, No. 166, F. & A. M., California Chapter No. 5, R. A. M., California Council No. 2, R. & S. M., Golden Gate Commandery No. 16, K. The Making of Cement

It is only lately that California, which consumes cement so largely, has been able to obtain supplies of that necessary article nearer home than from Europe and the East at great cost. When the article can be made in the East at a cost of about $1.90 per 400-pound barrel and is sold on our market at a figure somewhere near $3, and as extensive lime and clay deposits are lying idle within easy reach of San Francisco, the fact that we now have cement plants of our own is therefore of decided interest to capitalists. For several years ventures have been made, in the northern and central part of the State, but cement has not been successfully produced until within the last year. Two plants were lately erected near the bay of San Francisco and are now producing. The latest of these is the plant owned by the Standard Portland Cement Co., situated about a quarter of a mile south of the station of Napa Junction. Material is being taken from the old Badgley limestone quarry. The stone is composed of fragments of fossil shells, which give it an appearance slightly like that of a granite. The calcium carbonate contents is about 86 per cent and but little clay is needed to mix with the lime; the small amount necessary is obtained from above the limestone and in the same quarry. The surface croppings are of limited extent, covering only a part of the seventy acres of land owned by the company. However, the depth has been proven by bored wells to be considerable. One well is 173 feet deep and ends in the lime formation. Water is needed to a considerable extent for transformers and jackets, but the supply is not excessive, and the water is condensed and used several times. The power used is electricity. Only two motors are used, each having a capacity of 800 horse-power. An eight-inch shaft is connected with each motor. Air compressors are located in the first motor room. In addition the plant can be run by steam-generated electrical power. The fuel used is crude petroleum, which is brought by tank cars and transferred by gravity to the storage system of the plant. The quarry or pit is about a hundred feet from the building and is being worked in twenty-foot steps. Transportation of the raw material is accomplished by means of two six-ton cars drawn by cable from the pit up to the top of the mill bin, a raise of about forty feet. Separate cables and drums control the cars, which are automatically detached upon reaching the level track at the top. One track carries the lime rock and the other the clayey material. The bin feeds down to two Gates crushers. A chain elevator and belt conveyor deliver the crushed rock to either the drier or storage room. Storage is made in a large room which is practically a bin, emptying below by a belt conveyor. The object of storage at any stage of the process is to allow for stoppages at any preceding stage. Drying takes place in two continuous rotary kilns fifty feet long and five feet in diameter, and burning in eight rotary kilns sixty feet long and six feet inside diameter. An eight-inch lining of specially prepared brick, consisting largely of magnesite, protects the inner surface. A temperature of about 3,400 degrees is maintained, which almost fuses the mixture and forms a glassy compound resembling coke, but composed of calcium and aluminum silicates. The material passes through other processes and before the final grinding, gypsum is added, which tends to retard the setting to a convenient time and also makes a harder cement. The amount required is about 2 per cent of the weight of cement and is all shipped by rail from Nevada. Continued production of cement will increase a demand for gypsum and selenite. The principal obstacle to be overcome is cost of transportation. The capacity of this works is about 1,600 barrels per twenty-four hours. Over one hundred workmen are employed in the quarry and mill. The company is independent, having its own cooperage and machine shop, and everything has been constructed in the most substantial manner. California cement can easily displace the other makes now on the market and the industry may become one of importance to the State. In locating a site limestone and clay must be found in close proximity and cheap power and transportation must be available. A mill located at a distance from railroads, or if on a road at a very great distance from market, could not compete. In choosing materials considerable care is necessary and a final decision must be based on chemical analysis. The most harmful impurities in lime are magnesium, iron or silica. Clay must be very fine and of course free from the impurities mentioned. Sand or silica fine enough to not be noticeable as grit can be endured.

Christmas in Old England

"The fire, with well-dried logs supplied,
Went roaring up the chimney wide;
The huge hall table's oaken face
Scrubbed till it shone, the day to grace,
Bore then upon its massive board
No mark to part the squire and lord,
Then was brought in the lusty brawn
By old blue-coated serving man;
Then the grim boar's head frowned on high,
Crested with bays and rosemary.
Well can the green-barbed ranger tell
How, when and where the monster fell;
What dogs before his death he tore,
And all the bating of the boar.
The wassail round, in good brown bowls,
Garnished with ribbons, blithely trowls.
There the huge sirloin reeked; hard by
Plum porridge stood, and Christmas pie;
Nor failed old Scotland to produce
At such high tide her savory goose.
Then came the merry maskers in,
And carols roared with blithesome din;
If unmelodious was the song,
It was a hearty note and strong.
England was merry England when Old Christmas brought his sports again.
'Twas Christmas broached the mightiest ale;
'Twas Christmas told the merriest tale;
A Christmas gambol oft would cheer
The poor man's heart through half the year."

.. —Walter Scott.

The harbor of Navidad, Cuba, was discovered by Columbus on Christmas day, from which it takes its name.

It was at the Christmas Parliament of 1553 that the Church of England was established.

Queen Elizabeth's coronation and the preparations for the event were the absorbing occurrences of the Christmas period, 1557-58.

It was at a Christmas festival, 1214, that the barons demanded Magna Charta from King John, and at Christmas, 1265, the same barons, headed by Simon de Montford, succeeded in compelling his successor, Henry III, to summon the first national Parliament.

Californians in Literature

BY THE BOOKWORM.

The year 1903 has been one of steady work rather than of sensational happenings in the California literary world. We have had fewer preliminary announcements of great things about to happen, and therefore fewer disappointments over unrealized expectations, though perhaps this has been as much the result of a decay of the fad of sensational exploitation in bookland as of modesty on the part of writers.

Scarcely had we entered upon the new year, however, before a select coterie of Oakland club women embroiled themselves with Rudyard Kipling. The ladies conceived the idea of a Kipling calendar as a charity scheme, and immediately proceeded to compile one. Having completed their labors they thought it would be a polite attention on their part to signify to Mr. Kipling the honor they had conferred upon him, and when notified that they could not be permitted to carry out their intention, for the good and very sufficient business reason that a calendar had already been authorized and protected by agreement and copyright, there were daily indignation meetings held and fathers, husbands and university professors called to the rescue. It seemed to be impossible for the ladies to comprehend that Mr. Kipling could not in honor and honesty permit them to make use of quotations from his works and that it was not a question of graciousness or generosity on his part, but law and justice. They declared their intention of proceeding and trusting to the chivalry of American courts and the leagues of land and sea between Oakland, California, and Mr. Kipling's home in England. Whatever happened, it was not the publication of the calendar, and from the sudden dropping of the matter in the newspapers it is probable that a little ordinary business sense and obligation penetrated into the secret chambers of clubdom.

Californian authors have come to the fore in the larger world of letters during the year, and a number of the books which have attained the doubtful honors of being listed as best-sellers have been the work of writers from our State. First among these ranks "The Pit," the last completed work of Frank Norris, which was issued in book form early in the year, having appeared as a serial during the previous autumn. Mr. Norris's publishers have also collected some of his short stories and his literary essays. The short story was not Frank Norris's best medium of expression, and while his admirers are glad to have even the fragments of his work, they will add nothing to his reputation as a writer. The essays, "The Responsibilities of the Novelist," are strong, virile work, as tonic as a sea breeze.

Jack London has come into his own with the publication of "The Call of the Wild." In it he is on his favorite heath, the Klondike trail, and though it is just possible that the fad for nature books may have helped to call attention to a story in which a dog is made the hero, there is no question whatever about the book deserving all the attention it has had. Mr. London made his appearance in an entirely different field in another volume, "The Kempton-Wace Letters," which is rather a scientific analysis of sex-attraction than a work of fiction. His collaborator in this was Miss Anna Strunsky, also a Californian, at least by adoption. "The Kempton-Wace Letters" did not make a bid for popularity, for it was outside the category of epistolary love-stories. It is a book for the discriminating few. Still again Mr. London is heard from in a study of the conditions of life amongst the east-side poor of London, where the author took up his residence for the purpose of making observations. In addition, the name of Jack London appears with frequent recurrence in the tables on contents of the literary monthlies, always with something worth saying and well said.

Gwendolen Overton has also added three to her list of published books, "Anne Carmel," a study of life in the parsonage of a Canadian village, "The Golden Chain," a longish short story of the Southwest, reprinted in the Macmillan series of Little Novels, and "The Captain's Daughter," a juvenile published serially in St. Nicholas, and a welcome addition to the neglected field of books for girls.

Frances Charles, who attracted attention last year by her first novel, "In the Country God Forgot," followed up her success by "The Siege of Youth," in which she depicted a believeable and possible Bohemia where people work more than they play and rent and food bills are paid. She has also written a juvenile, "The Awakening of the Duchess," issued just in time to attract the attention of Santa Claus or his agents.

Geraldine Bonner's second novel, "Tomorrow's Tangle," depicts another phase of bonanza days in San Francisco. It is just as probable as her first book, "Hard Pan," but a less pleasant story, and less normal. "Hard Pan" might almost be called an average California experience, while "Tomorrow's Tangle" is an exceptional case.

Edward W. Townsend, whom we still claim in spite of his Eastern residence, also gave us three new books, "Lees and Leaven," in which he took up the threads of some of his characters in "Days Like These," "A Summer in New York," and "Fort Birkett," all of which were well received. "Chimmie Fadden" and "de Duchess" have not fallen out of sight during the year.

Will Irwin and Gelett Burgess collaborated on an amusing tale, the plot of which is woven about those characteristic celebrations, the carnivals held in every village large enough to have a paved street for a procession to pass and girls or women enough to furnish contestants for coronation honors.

In "The Socialist and the Prince" Mrs. Fremont Older produced a society melodrama which attracted much attention, since it was the first time that Dennis Kearney and his sand lot agitation have been exploited in fiction.

An exceptionally good book for a first volume was Alice Prescott Smith's "The Legatee," the scene of which was laid in the Wisconsin lumber region. It contained some graphic pictures of the great fire which devastated that section as well as studies of the labor question.

Charles Warren Stoddard's contributions consisted of a volume of fugitive essays, bits of description, reminiscences and recollections under the title "Exits and Entrances," and a novel, "For the Pleasure of His Company," which is believed to be more or less autobiographical, and is decidedly interesting.

Pauline Bradford Mackay, in private life Mrs. Herbert M. Hopkins, gave us "The Voice of the Desert," and Professor Hopkins himself, formerly of the University of California, has recently torn up academic circles, or perhaps one had better say, set them on fire by "The Torch," in which he has used as literary material some of the happenings at both Berkeley and Stanford.

Alfred Sonnichsen, whose "Ten Months Captive among the Filipinos" was one of the notable books growing out of the late war, produced an interesting and instructive volume entitled "Deep Sea Vagabonds." Mr. Sonnichsen inherits a restless foot and an observant eye, and the result of his observations and experiences makes good reading.

Hermann Whittaker produced a volume of Hudson Bay tales, and Mr. Bell collected some interesting war stories and reminiscences, both of which were brought out by local publishers.

Gertrude Atherton has been content with a compilation of "A Few Hamilton Letters," as a sort of supplement to her historical novel, or novelistic history of Alexander Hamilton.

Kate Douglas Wiggin has given us the best girls' book since Louise Alcott, in "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," and no better time for a republication of her old St. Nicholas serial, "Half a Dozen Housekeepers,' could be found than now, when the new book has recalled the two old sisters, Mirandy and Jane Sawyer, who figured in the early story.

Chester Bailey Fernald has done a good turn to his friends in bringing together between covers his anecdotes of Clarence O'Shay and Sudden Lannigan.

Charles Josselyn's "Favorite Book Shelf" has been laid under contribution and the contents offered to the public in the shape of choice extracts.

Mrs. Mary Austin's book, "The Land of Little Rain," was most favorably received, and has been added by the Bureau of Equipment to the library for seamen, especially those of the Pacific coast.

Of poets, new and old, we have had no lack. Joaquin Miller made haste to seize the occasion to launch his volume while the topic of race-suicide was before the public, but the public was in less haste to seize the volume. Of the others, Hermann Scheffauer's "Of Both Worlds," and Ambrose Bierce's volume are best worthy of mention. Frederick Milton Willis published a small collection also. Though there was early announcement of a forthcoming book by Agnes Tobin, the volume itself has not materialized.

The Paul Elder Company, which makes a specialty of minor publications of a certain kind, has brought out this year not only a second edition of the Cynic's Calendar of Revised Wisdom, but also a calendar and memorandum made up of hints and hits at matrimony—"Bachelor Bigotries," one concerning widows, a "Limerick Book," and "Johnny Jones's Nature Studies." Two other productions of this house especially worthy of mention are "Antigone," which followed the college production of the play, and "On Seeing an Elizabethan Play," called forth by the Stanford presentation of the "Knight of the Burning Pestle." The Paul Elder Company is also the publisher of the Impressionist Quarterly.

Pacific coast writers were deemed of sufficient importance for the Atlantic Monthly to make its July number over mainly to California, and the number of Californians who contribute to the Eastern magazines increases constantly. In September there were fifteen well known local names indexed in the principal periodicals, largely recruited from amongst those whose literary career began in the Sunday supplements.

Sunset, which was at first scarcely more than a railroad gazetteer, has now attained its full growth as a magazine, and an excellent one at that, while Out West, formerly The Land of Sunshine, more than justifies its existence. Either of these publications more nearly represents California than does the familiar Overland Monthly. We may claim a special interest in Everybody's also, since the editorial management is in the hands of ex-Californians, J. O'Hara Cosgrave, and Juliet Tompkins, now Mrs. Pottle. The Book-Lover, originally a San Francisco enterprise, but now issued in New York, still keeps in the front rank of literary publications, and has recently added book publishing to its other industry.

No series of articles contributed to a magazine attracted more earnest and widespread attention than those which Lincoln Steffens has written for McClure's, on the subject of municipal corruption, and if the author carries out his present intention of writing up state politics on the same lines there will be no question of his standing.

We have had comparatively few visitors of importance during the past twelve months. Bertha Runkle, whose name is now all but forgotten, and Ella Wheeler Wilcox, were exploited by the women's clubs, but neither was of sufficient importance to ruffle the waters of the literary pool. Elinor Gates, whose "Biography of a Prairie Girl" was such an instantaneous success last year, and her husband, James W. Tully, spent the summer in Oakland, while Elbert Hubbard, Laurence Hutton, and Kirk Monroe either paid short visits or passed through San Francisco on their way to other ports.

Among those who have passed to another world were Jessie Benton Fremont, widow of the Pathfinder, whose death occurred during the last week of the old year. Her literary work consisted entirely of reminiscences and autobiographical sketches.

Virna Woods, a promising playwright, was a victim to her over-solicitude concerning the production of one of her dramas.

Anton Roman, the pioneer book seller, one of the projectors of the original Overland Monthly, and more or less intimately connected with all the literary movements of early days, lost his life in a railroad disaster.

Dr. Charles W. Doyle of Santa Cruz died suddenly. He was a poet of more than ordinary ability as well as a prose writer of merit. Had he devoted his life to literature, instead of making it secondary to his other profession, his name would have been written high on the scroll of fame.

Noah Brooks, another of the pioneer contingent, also left us during the last twelvemonth. Though for many years a resident of the East he never lost touch with the Pacific Coast. He also, like Anton Roman, was associated with the early literary life of the State.

Professor L. DuPont Syle, formerly of the California University, died under peculiarly distressing circumstances. It is generally believed that he was the victim of a juggernaut system, and that his failing mental and physical health were directly attributable to a lack of human consideration on the part of his superiors. Professor Syle's literary work was not a popular success and there is no room in the educational world of these days for those whose names are not blared forth through the trumpet of notoriety.

On the whole, the year just past is a satisfactory one to review. Most of the work put forth by Californians has been good, some excellent, and very little of positive mediocrity. The majority of the new writers give promise of doing at least as well in the future, and there is good ground for expecting most to do still better. The infant prodigy appears to have been suppressed betimes, and that in itself is a cheerful sign. Californians are not unappreciative of home talent, and books by local writers never fail to reach a place among the best-sellers in San Francisco at least during the month of publication. If they do not hold their standing it is because they do not deserve it.

RAINIER STILL A LEADER.

Of all the beers that have been placed on the market during the past few years, none has won the high place in favor held by the Seattle Brewing and Malting Company's product. Rainier beer won its place by its pure merit, and it has stood the ordeal of time. There are many reasons that have contributed to the popularity of Rainier, the chief one lying in its own quality. Rainier is the best selling beer on the market, and the most frequently called for at restaurants, cafes and pleasure resorts. Its flavor is so delightful, its ingredients so absolutely pure, that no one who has ever tasted Rainier will stand for any substitute.

Where the Christmas Tree Came From

The Christmas tree does not belong, by right, to any other European families than those of Germanic and Scandinavian origin. Kelts and Slavs and Latins knew nothing of it and if it has found its way into France and Italy, even into England, it is an importation. The Christmas tree was certainly unknown to our forefathers. The relic of the Christmas tree with us is the ash fagot. The Germans when they accepted Christianity brought the yule tree into their new religion, and gave it a new signification. The missionaries to the Anglo-Saxons denounced it, and made every good Catholic hack the idolatrous symbol in pieces, and burn it at Christmas, in token that the Holy Child had destroyed heathenism. Among the Scandinavians, and probably among the Anglo-Saxons, the ash was the sacred tree. Yggdrasill, the world-tree, was, according to the Edda, an ash with three roots, one in heaven, one in hell, and one on earth. On the tree branches sat an eagle, along them ran a squirrel, and about its roots, gnawing into them, was coiled a great serpent. The serpent and the eagle are ever in strife, says the younger Edda, and the squirrel runs between them trying to make peace. But probably the sacred tree among the Germans was a pine. Tacitus speaks in his annals of a temple that the Marsii, a mid-German race, called Tafana, i. e., fanum tanae, made to resemble the earth. Tanne is pine tree, and the words of Tacitus have been supposed to refer to a sacred inclosure about a monstrous pine dedicated to the earth goddess. In one of the Wartburg Minnesinger's lays we have lines about the world-tree long after its real meaning was lost:

"A gallant tree is growing high
A garden gay adorning.
Its roots run down to hell below,
Its crown to heaven above doth throw
Where God doth sit in golden glow;
Its branches take the morning;
Distilling manna, dropping dew,
Its branches spread the whole world through,
And birds thereon are singing."

Otfried, in the Ninth century, sings of the cross in similar strains, deriving his ideas from Yggdrasill, which he translates into the tree of life in the garden of the church—the cross. So also Alcuin, writing among the Franks, says of the cross, "Its position is such that the lower portion touches the earth, the root reaches to hell. Its branches extend to all parts of the earth." —The Historian.

It was at Christmastide, 1085, that he proposed to his councilors the compilation of the records known as the Domesday Book.

Edward III was deposed by the Christmas Parliament of 1326-27.

Sir Isaac Newton was born on Christmas day, 1642. —The Chronicler.

The Virtuous Hoar

The position that we have assumed with reference to the Republic of Panama has aroused the virtuous indignation of that eminent and venerable statesman, Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts. He has taken the President to task for having encouraged the people of Panama to secede from Colombia, and also for declaring his intention to preserve the peace of the Isthmus after having officially recognized the new Government. In the opinion of Senator Hoar we should not have meddled in the politics of a sister State, and the Administration was guilty of a highly immoral act in protecting the people of Panama from aggression while they were engaged in securing their independence. Senator Hoar's objection to our friendly attitude toward Panama is, of course, based upon the supposition that the Administration was prompted by selfishness; that if the question of expediency were not involved we would have kept our hands off. Senator Hoar may be right, but if the canal were not at stake the gentleman from Massachusetts would in all probability applaud the interposition of our Government. There is no doubt that the people of Panama were aggrieved; that they had suffered great injustice at the hands of the corrupt authorities of Bogota, and that they were justified in seeking their independence. They were entitled to the sympathy of all civilized and humane nations. Under the circumstances, if we had no selfish interests to subserve we would have felt it our duty to espouse the cause of the seceders, and if we asserted our intention to preserve the peace of the Isthmus, as we had bound ourselves to do, no intelligent person would have questioned the justice of our course. Why should the canal question alter the case? Is it not an additional reason for espousing the cause of the Panamans? It is the duty of the authorities at Washington to take every precaution to safeguard the interests of this country, and it is now conceded that the building of the Panama canal is of paramount importance to us. Moreover the building of that canal is to the interest of the people of Colombia, for anything that will augment the military power of this country is of benefit to all countries on this continent which we have undertaken to guard from foreign aggression. No European nation situated as we are would have hesitated to take possession of the canal, but through a high regard for the maxims of international morality, which are more highly honored in the breach than in the observance, we offered to purchase it for a good round sum. The Colombians, knowing our reluctance to do aught which might be construed as an imposition on a feeble and inferior State, resolved to extort an exorbitant sum, and now that they find that their greed has brought disaster upon their country they cry out for justice. But they are appealing with unclean hands. Senator Hoar might be engaged in better business than that of casting odium on his country for the part that it played in the drama which had the independence of Panama for its motif.

His Loss of Popularity

At this great distance from the centre of political activity in this country it is decidedly difficult to "size up the situation." Some months ago it was a foregone conclusion that Roosevelt would be the nominee of the Republican party, but those who conceded at that time that he would be the choice of the convention are now expressing doubt, and hinting that perhaps some other man may become the standard bearer. It has been known all along that those powerful bosses, Hanna, Platt, Quay and Cullom, who can always swing a Republican convention when they combine to do so, were not anxious for his nomination, and that they were for him in a half-hearted way because they believed his popularity was so great it would be suicidal to defeat him. Gradually the situation has been changing; the President's popularity is on the wane, and by the time the convention meets it may be found that none but the "pie-counter brigade" wishes to see him nominated. Various causes have combined to weaken him before the people. In the first place, when he was swinging round the circle some months ago, he impressed many old-fashioned people with the notion that he lacked the repose that harmonizes with the dignity of his high office. Then, his attitude toward the labor unions is responsible for the alienation of capital throughout the country without strengthening him with those whom he sought to placate. His enemies have been saying that he is responsible for much of the arrogance of organized labor, and they call attention to the fact that though he has lectured capital, no excesses of the unions, though carried to the extreme of riot and murder, have ever called out a word of rebuke from him. But perhaps nothing that the President has done during the whole course of his political career awakened such widespread distrust and disapproval as his promotion of the erstwhile Captain-Doctor Wood to the Major-Generalcy. While there is general admiration for the public official who sticks to his friends, quite a different sentiment is awakened when the manifestation of loyalty is accompanied by gross unfairness and injustice to men who have earned the gratitude of their country in the public service. The press of the country is almost unanimous in its disapproval of the promotion of Wood, the army and the friends of the army are indignant at the favoritism that has been shown him, and even men who are disposed to stand by the President in all his acts unite in condemnation of a step which will place great responsibility in the hands of a man who has not given satisfactory evidence of ability to sustain it.

Evidence of Disaffection

It is most significant of the great change that has taken place in the political situation, that the Republicans who are most friendly to Roosevelt are now discussing the probability of his election without the vote of New York. That there is danger of New York's going Democratic in the event of Roosevelt's nomination is a fact that is now engrossing the attention of wise politicians, and the President's friends have been put to the necessity of trying to prove that it is possible for him to win without the Empire State. This is a matter that Republican organs in this part of the country do not care to discuss. They desire to be in a position to make the usual hurrah campaign if Roosevelt be nominated. But that there is grave alarm in the East is evident when such a man as General Grosvenor finds it expedient to remark, "Roosevelt would be much stronger in some parts of the country if certain elements in New York were opposed to us." Perhaps he would, but he would much rather have the support of those certain elements in New York. The situation is becoming critical so far as Roosevelt is concerned, and the Democratic leaders of New York are more hopeful than ever. In all probability they will send a delegation instructed for Chief Judge Parker to their convention.

The Reaction Against Labor Unions

The Citizens' Industrial Association urges all those who are opposed to trades union tyranny to refuse to allow the goods they make and sell to bear the union label. It is a poor rule that won't work both ways. For a long time organized labor has sought to force its label upon manufacturers, dealers and consumers, and it has been very successful in the exercise of coercion. There was a time when the label was regarded merely as a means of advertising union labor. It was tolerated by the public because public sympathy was with the unions, and it had not become an agency of oppression. Of late, however, organized labor has provoked prejudice against the label. They have made it apparent that the label and the boycott are closely related. When the label is missing the boycott is declared. The label indicates those with whom organized labor should deal, and when a consumer insists on a label he is boycotting every article which does not bear the stamp of union endorsement. Now the Citizens' Industrial Association thinks that the label should indicate the goods which should be discriminated against in defense of the principle of the open shop and the freedom of individual contract. This stand taken by the Industrial Association is a forerunner of the more widespread movement that is developing in the East against trades union excesses and abuses. And such appears to be the condition of public feeling, that it is more than likely that a combination of consumers to destroy the agency by which the boycott is made effective will prove successful. No observing person has the slightest doubt as to the state of public feeling today toward trades unions. Not long ago the trade union movement was regarded as a beneficent social revolution for the welfare of mankind, but this view of its function is no longer general. Crimes and conspiracies which menace the fundamental institutions of the commonwealth, and the defense of practices which tend toward anarchy, have destroyed public faith in the sincerity of the men by whom organized labor is led. The expediency of organized labor is still recognized, but that its excesses should be curbed, and its sophistries overwhelmed, all patriotic and intelligent Americans believe. Organized labor has made the mistake of assuming that there is only one phase of public opinion in this country concerning the matters in which it is chiefly interested.

About Appendicitis

Appendicitis has done more to bring the surgeon's knife into play in the last ten years than all the other afflictions to which flesh is heir. Numerous operations for appendicitis are performed in this city every day, and yet the medical profession has done nothing toward educating the public with a view of rendering the disease less common. There is probably no other disease concerning which there is such dense ignorance among laymen. Some years ago it was thought that it was always caused by some seed or other substance lodging in the troublesome vermiform appendix, and stories were told about surgeons making an incorrect diagnosis and having a grape seed on hand by way of corroborative evidence to deceive the patient. Statistics, however, are leading to the conviction that the best way to avoid appendicitis is to diet principally on fruit and vegetables, and that the disease is caused in most cases by eating meat. It has been noticed that vegetarians never suffer from appendicitis, and that the disease seldom occurs among the peasants of Europe, who eat very little meat. The abuse of meat appears to be the true cause of the evil, and it is most frequent among Anglo-Saxons who are the great eaters of beefsteaks and bleeding roasts. That the use of the knife is essential to the cure of the disease is an exploded idea in Europe, and considerable interest has lately been taken in the report from Paris that in 1902 the military hospitals received six hundred and sixty-six patients afflicted with appendicitis, only one hundred and sixty-eight of whom were operated upon. Of that number twenty-three died, while the four hundred and eighty not treated with the knife furnished but five deaths. According to the rule in this country the operations would have numbered four hundred and eighty and the proportion of deaths would have been at the same ratio as in the surgical cases in Paris. But in this country doctors have great faith in the knife. People yield larger fees when cut than when merely dosed with nostrums.

Didn't See the Joke

New York is losing its sense of humor. The cause is worthy of serious speculation. Perhaps it is due to the fact that the overgrown metropolis has been taking itself seriously for so many years. There is nothing so fatal to a sense of humor in an individual as incessant self-congratulation in serious mood for a protracted period. It promotes a feeling of superiority and a disposition to pose, both of which are characteristic of serious-minded people. The character of a metropolis is that of its people. It is possible that New York's sense of humor has suffered from the influence of the musical comedies which have supplied the people with entertainment during the last few years.

It is acknowledged that the stage influences the morals of the people. Isn't it reasonable to assume that it also affects their sense of humor? When people are forced to reduce their intelligence to the level of a Clyde Fitch comedy or a Harry B. Smith libretto, in order to render their risibles susceptible of agitation, it is natural that in time they should find themselves incapable of appreciating genuine humor. Evidence of the sobermindedness of the metropolis was supplied on the recent occasion of the seventh annual dinner of young Mr. Rockefeller's Bible class, when Senator Depew spoke of the "supreme folly" of attempting to "rival and reach great fortunes" at the sacrifice of "all the pleasures of life and all its opportunities in many directions open for enjoyment, culture and progress." Senator Depew is looked upon as one of New York's foremost wits. Yet on this occasion he was not jocose. He was as serious as when he led his young bride to the altar some months ago. But here was Croesus himself, addressing a Bible class of a young millionaire on the supreme folly of competing for riches. It was the funniest spectacle that has been presented in New York for many a year, but nobody saw the joke. It didn't raise a laugh. The newspapers treated Senator Depew's remarks with the utmost gravity. The Senator argued that it was absurd to try to become a millionaire because, if you get in the millionaire class, you may be far from the top; relatively to others in it your means may be only modest. "The million-dollar man has no rank or place or consideration in the ten million class, and the ten-million chap is a little fellow in the fifty million or one hundred million circle." The Senator was seeking to make poverty content with its condition, but with young Rockefeller as a conspicuous example of distinction in material wealth, and the speaker himself as an instance of what is to be accomplished by the ardent pursuit of the dollar, it must have been hard for the young men in the Bible class to divert their minds from thoughts of wealth and the ambition to get it. Senator Depew is not the man to inculcate a love of ideals, and young Mr. Rockefeller is not a personality to inspire people with an indifference to the advantages of great wealth. That such a lecture given by a Depew under such auspices was not accepted as a contribution to the gayety of the metropolis is certainly convincing that the New York temperament has become soggy.

The Overworked Female

In looking over the Sunday supplements, illustrated papers, and a large portion of the magazine output, the thought strikes one that it would not be a bad idea if women were given a rest for awhile. We see and hear entirely too much about them both as individuals and as a sex, and we cannot help but feel that it would indicate a more wholesome condition of affairs if they were relegated to the background. Just as soon as a woman attains a little prominence, whether it be as a light of stageland, the victim of an accident, the perpetrator of a crime, or the dispenser of her husband's income, she is pushed forward and her opinion on every possible subject is given publicity. Possibly, like the royal duchess who exhibited herself for "charity" at so much per peek, in her coronation robes, some of the women really believe the world is hanging on their utterances, but usually it is only morbid and unhealthy vanity. It is not the women of brains who are consulted, but the garrulous contingent whose stream of talk goes on forever and whose views are of no more interest than the babbling of the brook. But the sayings and doings of women in general and of women as individuals are of no special importance, anyway. The sensations of a millionairess in a ferryboat accident are precisely the same as those of a factory hand and neither one nor the other is able to set a fashion in nerves. That women play golf or ride bicycles, or wear short skirts and thick shoes, and discard gloves, has no effect on the national policy. Their amusements and recreations, their fads and their foibles, and even their attempts at serious occupations, are of no special consequence. Women are not particularly new. Eve was created shortly after Adam and there has never been a time since then when there have not been women in the world. The amount of attention lavished on them has made them, as a sex, very much like spoiled children. They have gained a false impression of their own importance and are badly in need of wholesome and judicious letting alone, if not actual suppression.

Hot Lunches for School Children

In the East there is a fad for providing school children with free hot lunches at noon, and of course San Francisco is not to be outdone—not if she knows herself—so the free hot lunch is under discussion and consideration. The faddist never takes the trouble to investigate conditions. That is not necessary at all. Now, the fact is that nine-tenths of the children of San Francisco, whether they attend public or private schools, go home at noon, and of the other tenth, the greater number take their lunches because they are seeking special advantages and their parents, being able to supply them with carfare to carry them to schools at a distance from their homes, are under no necessity for demanding public aid in providing them with luncheons. School children, as a rule, have their breakfasts at eight o'clock or thereabouts, and they are a long way from starvation by twelve. There is no more reason why the municipality should be taxed to feed them at noon than there is for providing breakfasts, or "snacks" at the afternoon dismissal hour. In these indulgent days they are not roused before daylight and turned out to do a half-day's work in barn chores, milking and the like before the first meal, nor do they tramp miles through frost and snow to reach a cold barn of a schoolhouse. On the contrary, few of them stir from their blankets till after repeated calling, and it is an exceptional child who has any task to perform beyond eating breakfast and making ready for school, where they arrive with the taste of their food still fresh on their tongues. If there are to be any warm meals provided it is the teachers who should be made the beneficiaries. They are the ones who perform the arduous tasks in the modern school rooms, and who carry their cold luncheons. They may not leave the school premises during the day without special permission which is not granted for the mere asking, and having spent the day about their allotted tasks they are still under orders to attend school themselves or special meetings, or one thing or another which adds an hour or two to the length of their day. More than once we have seen school directors protesting against the wicked indulgence of teachers, who actually had a cup of hot tea at noontime, and there are some principals who will not permit the boiling of a kettle. The children of this day are over-pampered. The school department has other duties besides that of superseding the parents. The more that is done for people the more they demand and the less they exert themselves. If lunches are to be provided there is no reason why dinners and breakfasts should be cut off. If football outfits are paid for from the public treasury, still more should shoes and stockings, aprons, skirts, jackets and trousers be requisitioned. If baths are provided, why not beds? There is only one good thing to be said for all this overloading of non-essentials; eventually there must come a last straw under which the camel will lie down.

The Nagger

The nagging woman is once more a topic of discussion, and we are having all the old nonsense about delicate nervous organisms, over-work, ill-health and a multiplicity of duties brought out to air in their usual connection. Nothing so pleases a nagging woman, and nothing could be devised more certain to provide encouragement, than this pampering with high-flown excuses. The nagging woman, in plain English, is a bad tempered woman. She has a very much exaggerated idea of her own importance in the scheme of things, and she is provided with victims, in the shape of husbands, children or employes who cannot escape from the lashings of her tongue. One would imagine, from the manner in which the contributors to the discussions write, that nagging is to be found only amongst poor housewives obliged to give their personal care to all the details of the menage, besides caring for large families of small children on inadequate incomes. As a matter of fact, the nagger is to be found in all ranks and conditions, and some of the most inveterate are women who have not a care or a duty on earth beyond their own pleasures. The nagging woman is the logical development of the teasing child, who succeeds in getting all it wants by dint of making life a burden until its demands are complied with, be they reasonable or otherwise. Men who find the poutings and sulkings and exactions of their adored ones most bewitching during courtship are very apt to waken, when it is too late, to the knowledge that pretty pussy has claws and is not averse to using them. Naturally, the inclination of a young husband is to try gentle means and give in when the matter is one of no particular moment, but the nagger is never generous. She never admits that she was wrong, or makes a return in kind by abating her own position. On the contrary, each concession is seized as a right and used as a precedent when the next time comes. Children born of nagging mothers come under the rod from the beginning. They accept it as a matter of course, though a disagreeable one, and all too often they adopt the same methods, profiting by the example. What the nagger needs is not gentleness and submission but firm and rigid discipline. Ill-health has nothing to do it with, for there are naggers who have never known a sick day; over-work is not the cause, for really busy people have no time to imagine slights and grievances and hardships. Reasoning will do no good, for a nagger has no reason. Men cannot desert their wives, or children leave home because they are cursed with ugly-tempered mothers, but it is a great pity that the ducking stool cannot be revived. Wherever there is a woman to oversee employes, be it a housekeeper with a retinue of servants, or a forewoman in a shop, there is this same display of cantankerous fault-finding and "jawing"; there is less work accomplished and more friction engendered. The nagger will never be brought to time by gentleness, for that is foreign to her understanding. To all intents and purposes she is a setting hen, and the most effective treatment for the persistent gallinacian is to duck her in the cold water trough.

The Great American Novel

Mr. Chester Bailey Fernald says that to write the American novel the ambitious literary person should travel and contemplate the United States from the other side of the Atlantic. "To write the great American novel," says Mr. Fernald, "one must be, among other things, a great critic, and a great critic will survey America from the broadest base line the world affords—which is European civilization of the twentieth century." The conceit of the average novel writer of the day is appalling. Having written a novel, Mr. Fernald is laboring under the delusion that he is an authority of some importance in the literary world. The probability is that he wouldn't recognize the great American novel if it were dedicated to him. What has criticism to do with the writing of a novel? Why should a writer of vivid imagination, keen perceptive faculty and highly developed powers of observation, such as are essential to the writing of a great novel, find it necessary to travel abroad in order to write something characteristic of this land and of the people and their manners and customs? It is well for a writer to travel. It improves his mind and broadens his viewpoint, but a man may be mentally equipped for the writing of a great novel distinctly national in flavor without becoming a spectator in a foreign land. The real object of the novel is the delineation of human character, and the great American novel should portray a state of society distinctly American, and mirror the most salient features of our civilization. Why should it be necessary to cross the ocean to accomplish the task? If we had a Hugo or a Dumas amongst us he wouldn't find it necessary to travel before perpetuating his views between book-covers. Information and experience are essential to the writing of great fiction, but not for the purpose of strengthening the imagination, which is never so strong as in people incapable of reasoning—savages and dreamers—but for the purpose of enabling the writer to communicate his conceptions to others. However, it is wasting time to give serious consideration to the great American novel. Who knows but that it has already been written and sidetracked! Some of the greatest works of literature were not discovered until the authors had passed away.

Ideal Debts

BY HARRY COWELL.

About Christmas time it is ever seasonable to call to mind and emphasize certain facts, the contemplation of which may, haply, greaten the good-will of man towards man, may soften and cause to glow with gratitude the heart of man, which, in a machine age, tends to become hard and cold as steel. Among the most effective of such facts are what may be termed ideal debts, in contradistinction to those practical debts which may be settled with so much gold. Ideal debts, nothing less than ideal love can liquidate. Assuming that we are, most of us, glad to be alive, then if Creative Beneficence caused the universe in which we find ourselves to come into being, to Creative Beneficence are we indeed primarily indebted.

How immense the debt man owes to matter no man fully realizes; not the scientist, not the philosopher—to matter which fools and ingrates affect to despise. Man, though his feet seem free of the earth, has roots, attachments to the soil, no less real than those of the tree. The contemner of matter cannot lift his sneering lip nor exhale through haughty nostrils his disdainful breath without illustrating his dependence on matter. Read Darwin on the action of earth-worms, consider in all humility the extent of your ideal debt to them, and tread no more with indifference on those little squirming objects of contempt.

To scorn the senses is no less folly and ingratitude. The soul's indebtedness to the senses is incalculable. Few things are more spiritual than music; but if the material ear be defective or the material violin out of tune, what then? Though lovers "walk upon the winds with lightness," yet not even their feet are wholly free of the earth.

With eyes that at best are but beautiful dust, miracles of matter, we behold the dream face of a flower, dust also; and though the will-o'-the-wisp, we, survive the day when dust of flower and dust of eyes shall have become indistinguishable the one from the other, none the less are we indebted to the dust. Ignorant indeed is the soul that does not know that Matter is the name of a benefactor; and base indeed the soul that, knowing, forgets to be thankful.

What the present owes to the past is easily overlooked. But when we remember that, because this and that scientist or inventor went sleepless years ago, we may now sleep more comfortably and securely o'nights, we wake up of mornings with a desire to pay to the living and to those yet to be born the debt we owe to the dead. Part payment is all that the richest and most generous may hope for. No man dies solvent. Leave no matter how royal a legacy to the world, and it is still doubtful whether time itself should see wiped out the last of your ideal debts. Today's human product, far from perfect though it be, is the work of ages. Man is cumulative. The unfittest among us had parents who, in some way, by hook or by crook, survived to maturity, and they in their turn parents who had passed at least the age of puberty, and so on ad infinitum to the little beginnings of life. We are all the chosen of the chosen of the chosen. Each generation does not have to begin life de novo, but may take up where its predecessor left them. Today ten thousand conveniences are ready to hand which were unheard of yesterday. The civilized babe levies contributions from the uttermost ends of the earth. For years before we are able to turn over a hand for the world, the world works for us. "Indirectly," you interpose, "by way of father and mother." Well, what of it? True, to our parents we who find life desirable are deeply indebted—and that notwithstanding the fact that, though ends to nature, to them we were but incidents, incidents of their love;—but apart from society what could the best of fathers and mothers do for us?

Outside of society man is an impossibility. Those who look down on the "working masses" forget that their superior selves live only by means of the "working masses." The duke, proud of his inability to do for himself, depends on his "dependents." These winter morns we nibble our rolls and read our newspapers and warm our toes over the coals, forgetful of the baker's flour-wan face, the life-consuming linotype, and the dangers that beset the miner in the darkness underground. We have parted with our dollars; we have paid our shot; we owe no man anything, least of all to love him!

The ideal debts of savage nations are much fewer than those of civilized. If a German doctor makes a discovery in medicine, sick folk the civilized world over—French, English, American—are in a fair way to benefited thereby. The more one country takes advantage of all forms of progress that obtain elsewhere the better off it is, but also the more ideally indebted. How ungrateful it is for a Frenchman who loves music to hate the land that produced Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Mozart. How absurd for the modern German student to shake his fist at the England of Darwin, Huxley and Herbert Spencer.

The extent of a man's ideal debt is proportionate to the largeness of his life. To owe but little to men in general and to poets, painters, sculptors, philosophers, scientists, inventors, and the like, in particular, is to be poor indeed; for, note this beautiful paradox: In the ideal world the richest man is he who is most in debt.

The Saunterer

The Other Viewpoint

Many people are very uncharitable in their view of the case of Secretary McKowen of the Berkeley Board of Regents. They regard only the criminal aspect of the case, and completely overlook the public's indebtedness to him for having exposed the official negligence of his superiors in a manner so dramatic as to insure earnest attention. It has been demonstrated on more than one occasion that the highly respectable and apathetic regents were in need of an awakening. It would be difficult to estimate the cost to the State of their profound stupidity as exemplified during the course of their administration. They lost the Sutro library, and it was not long ago that they lost an important suit on a mortgage through gross negligence. But those were matters that were given comparatively little publicity. It remained for Secretary McKowen to make a sensational expose of the kindergarten methods by which our State University is governed. Though he had to turn criminal in order to render this great public service, the indebtedness of the commonwealth should not be repudiated. When the time comes to consider extenuating circumstances it should be remembered that he not only gave the university a lesson in bookkeeping and aroused the regents to a sense of their responsibility, but that incidentally he impressed President Wheeler with the importance of safeguarding trust funds with the same degree of caution that he would give to his own. No doubt the legislature will be importuned to pass a bill reimbursing President Wheeler for the amount of trust funds stolen from him, but obviously such legislation would be a fraud on the public. It's too bad that Mrs. Hearst isn't here to straighten out the tangle.

"Freely ye have received, freely give!" is the Scriptural motto for this season of the year, which comes to remind us that the best use of money is the spending of it.

Greenway's Triumph

There was much disappointment at the Greenway dance last week over the indifference of Herman Oelrichs to the delights of Terpsichore. Several girls saved dances in expectation of being asked to trip the light fantastic with the transplanted New Yorker who was, not many years ago, a popular Newport beau. But the distinguished club man has long since foresworn the strenuous life on the waxed floor. Mrs. Oelrichs danced a great many times, and seemed to enjoy herself very much. She is very light on her feet, but is not a particularly graceful dancer. The presence of Mr. and Mrs. Oelrichs at the dance was a great triumph for Czar Ned. It gave the belles and buds something to talk about, and incidentally it silenced unkind rumor which has been somewhat active ever since the revocation of the power-of-attorney under which Mr. Oelrichs formerly attended to his wife's interests.

Good-Natured Jimmy

It has been frequently said of James D. Phelan that if he had a sense of humor he would be more successful in politics. Yet that Mr. Phelan possesses a keen sense of humor has been proved at numerous jinks of the Bohemian Club. It is customary to satirize the young millionaire at the jinks of the club over which he presides, and he always appears to enjoy the fun. At least he gives visible manifestation of his appreciation of the humor of the satire. A few years ago when Dick Hotaling bestrode an ass labeled James D. Phelan, at the Midsummer Jinks, the exquisite delicacy of the satire caused the millionaire to explode with laughter. Last Saturday night, during the "Abe Hur" jinks, Phelan was represented as an irrepressible "Buttinsky" who was incessantly happening on the scene without apparent purpose, and exclaiming, "When I was in politics. He typified the common nuisance whom everybody was kept busy suppressing. Of course the character was intended as a breezy satire, and Mr. Phelan, the dignified millionaire and president of the club, good-naturedly took it as such. His smile was a study. He was accompanied, by the way, by his cronies, Franklin K. Lane and Gavin McNab, who were his guests for the occasion, and who greatly honored the club by their presence. Mr. Lane has ceased repudiating McNab, both have ceased repudiating Phelan, and all three have temporarily called off the repudiation of Hearst. In all of which there is suggestion of a theme for the next jinks.

The Burlesque

There were some fine papers read at the jinks Saturday night. John McNaught's graceful and poetic paper on the Mistletoe won great applause, and Justice Henshaw scored a hit in a humorous vein. Governor Pardee read a paper that might have been written by a country curate. The Low Jinks was a medley of absurdities. It was a burlesque entitled "Abe Hur, or a Triumph of Pure Politics, the most expensive production ever given on any stage, as dramatized by Will Irwin from Charles Josselyn's thrilling religious novel, 'My Favorite Bookshelf,' and presented by J. C. Wilson's All-Star Company of three hundred and fifty people, of whom thirty-six will positively appear on the stage." In the cast of characters were Abe Hur, proprietor of the Kearny street Palace of Diamonds, played by Dick Hotaling; Morris, his clerk, J. B. Leighton; Visalia, walking delegate of the Chicken Pickers' Union, Jack Wilson; The Three Wise Guys, Blocker, Spitz and Lean, impersonated by A. R. Hardin, Newton Tharp and Frank P. Deering; Irish, a siren, Harry Melvin; politicians, boycotters, and the Roman army, represented by Gordon Ross in Scotch plaids; Phelanides the Has-Been.

Action of the Play

The synopsis of scenes was very funny. A note by the management explained that in consideration of "the feelings of the family men and of Oaklanders anxious about the last boat it has been decided at enormous expense to combine the prologue and the epilogue." This combination resulted in the Meeting of the Three Wise Guys, each one making a characteristic speech. The scenery of the burlesque was Night on Upper Kearny Street by Cadenasso, with Moonlight Effects by Peters. Act one showed the front of Abe Hur's Palace of Diamonds, scenery by Dickman, diamond effects from the proceeds of the late exhibition. This showed the brick thrown as in Ben Hur, the grand entrance of the Roman army (Gordon Ross) and the triumph of Visalia. Act II, scene one, showed the galleys. which was really a street with the chain gang at work upon it. An automobile parade came along; there was the cry, "Save yourselves who can," and Abe Hur saved the life of the Police Commissioner, the circumstance that gave him his political start in life. Act third showed the union fusion political headquarters (the scenery from paintings in the Phelan collection). It was followed by The Conflagration, with light effects by McComas. A program note called attention to the three balls of real gold. The second scene of this act showed Upper Kearny street, designed from life by Orrin Peck. Between the two scenes of Act fifth, the program announced that gentlemanly ushers would pass through the audience and collect the eggs. The last scene was The Chariot Race, one of the funniest things in this funny production. The three candidates were driven by the three bosses. Each candidate bestrode a hobby horse upon which he jumped up and down. Meanwhile, the most striking buildings in San Francisco, the Call building, the City Hall, and the Ferry building, were rushed past, carried by various supers. There was a collision which resulted in the death of Lean and Phelanides, and the grand climax showed the triumph of Schmitz and Abe Hur.

"It's evident that Mrs. Snobber is no spendthrift."

"What is the evidence?"

"Those ribbons on her holly wreaths. She had them on her lawn dress last summer."

The Active Anvil Chorus

When Mrs. Mark Gerstle decided to appear at the De Young vaudeville instead of at the Verein jinks, she had not the faintest conception of the sensation that her decision was destined to create. The anvil chorus has been working overtime ever since. But Mrs. Gerstle is a woman of considerable independence and she isn't worrying herself about what the knockers are saying. She belongs to the ultra-fashionable set of Jewish society, and it was quite a shock to the members thereof to learn that they were to be deserted by one of the most talented of their number. They are wondering now whether she considers them too slow. Mrs. Gerstle is of a lively disposition and quite versatile. Besides being a clever actress, she sings well, plays brilliantly on the piano, has a talent for drawing, and is an interesting raconteuse.

Burgess's Great Find

Gelett Burgess is telling a story about an estate which he has purchased in Provence, and it is almost as improbable as his Purple Cow, but he swears that it is a sober fact. The property is in Baux, that picturesque old hill town which is one of the sights of the Midi, and it comprises a promontory of pine covered ground, hemmed in by orchards of olive and fir. It is the site of a ruined chateau which was destroyed by Richelieu, and on the land are dozens of second century Roman sarcophagi which he is to have excavated. Adjacent are prehistoric caves and near by is the Valley d'Enfer which inspired Dante with the stage setting for his Purgatory. The site commands a fine view of the Mediterranean, and the whole thing, says Burgess, cost him the princely sum of forty dollars. Chester Bailey Fernald is another Californian writer who has been looking for an estate on which to pitch his tent, and he says that though he traveled the wide world over, he could not refrain from dreaming of the Golden State. So he is coming back to locate a home on a hill-slope which affords a view of San Francisco bay.

Querulousness at the Trough

Before Auditor Baehr and School Director Woodward became tax-eaters they were very warm friends, but when they began feeding at the same trough they drifted apart. They clashed about a year ago when the Board of Education laid off its repair force on the plea that it was short of funds. It was a ruse to force the Supervisors to appropriate more money for educational purposes. As the watchdog of the treasury Baehr exposed the deception, and Woodward rushed the mechanics back to work in a hurry for, the trick having been exposed, he was afraid to incur the ill-will of the working men. He has been sore on the Auditor ever since, and at one time he talked in a way that impelled Baehr to threaten to institute proceedings for criminal libel. First, however, he called on the Mayor who persuaded him to drop the matter after promising to warn Woodward to be more polite in his utterances. Recently Woodward broke out again and accused Baehr of holding up demands on the treasury as a "grand-stand play," and then signing them after getting a little newspaperiety. Now I am told that there are two demands Baehr will not sign—one of them for printing a campaign document in the guise of a committee report, and charging the cost against the school fund, and one for the cost of paraphernalia for the football team of the Lowell High School.

Let There Be Light

However, Woodward is responsible, I believe, for only one of them—the printing job. For that, I believe, he was haled before the Grand Jury of which he is a member. The champion of the other bill was School Director Roncovieri, the old orchestra chum of Mayor Schmitz. He has a boy attending the Lowell High School. These little matters are faint side-lights on the manner in which public funds are handled in the City Hall. The illumination is so faint that one sees the methods of our tax-eaters as through a glass darkly, but oh, what wouldn't a flood of light reveal if we only had a foot-loose Grand Jury to throw the calcium on unsparingly!

Mrs. Prag's Pull

The rumor that Mark intends to resign from the Board of Education to take the principalship of the Girls' High School is discredited by many who know the thrifty school director. They say that he won't give up his present job unless he has an absolute cinch on something better. Principal Brooks denies that he has any intention of resigning, but it is said that he will be persuaded to do so. Meanwhile it is thought that Mrs. Prag will succeed him. She is a sister of Mrs. Julius Kahn, and Julius, it is said, secured the appointment of School Director Woodward's son to West Point. So Mrs. Prag has a pull not to be lightly considered. As she bosses the school and the principal now, it would be easy for her to assume the salary as well as the duties of the position. Indeed she is better qualified for the principalship than she is to teach, because as principal, were she to follow in the footsteps of Brooks, she would enjoy uninterrupted repose. Now she takes a nap every day during school hours, and that occasions comment among her pupils, who are thus afforded an insight into the easy ways of our public servants. As principal she could be just as effective as Brooks if she had a folding bed in her office and occupied it all day. By the way, there are soporific germs in the atmosphere of the Girls' High School, and they affect the entire faculty of venerable ladies.

"You're a lobster," said the Best-selling, Popular Novel.
"Wish I were," sighed the Scientific Work, "then I'd be red."

She Really Went and Married

When Sarah Whitney announced her engagement a few years ago with a Mr. Robinson she had met in Paris her bachelor friends cried "Fie fie! And you with such a career before you!" They couldn't imagine how a girl with Miss Whitney's talent in sculpture could tie herself down to any other master but Art with the biggest of capitals. But Sarah did not marry right away and her friends' fears began to calm, as they thought perhaps the engagement was only the result of a flitting fancy. The young artist returned to California and set up a studio in this city, where she sculped a few busts of clubmen and others, and kept up her practice. Then she deserted the Latin Quarter of our city and fled Eastward again, thence to Europe. And now word comes that she has married her faithful fiance. Mr. B. M. Robinson is an artist, too, and the honeymoon will be such as one reads about in French art annals.

A Trifle Reticent

Miss Alice Coleman, a niece of Mose Gunst, has returned from abroad where she has been having her voice cultivated. Her friends have all understood that she was studying with the intention of going on the operatic stage, and it was said that at the proper time Mr. Gunst would see that she made her debut under fine auspices. Since her return there has been great curiosity in Jewish circles as to her plans, but she has shown no inclination to take anybody into her confidence. But there is some talk of her going into comic opera.

"Brown has a very expensive wife."
"Is that so?"
"Yes; last year she had appendicitis and now I hear that she has twins."

Strenuous William Greer

Some of the women of the California Club are slowly recovering from the shock they received some days ago when that strenuous exponent of physical culture, William Greer Harrison, bounded into their midst, and delivered himself of a jeremiad against the accumulation of fat. Mr. Harrison doesn't mince words any more than he does his gait. He talks straight from the shoulder as becomes the true athlete, and when he locates the solar plexus he hits it without regard to its gender. He appeared before the California Club on the ocasion of the review of the year's work, for he is the leader of the physical culture section. He began by complimenting the ladies on being present. He said he was glad to see them but would be more pleased if they were in proper gymnasium costume and in his physical culture class. However he presumed they were too lazy to exert themselves. Moreover they were too stupid and were threfore unable to know what was good for them. "The fact is," said he, "nearly all the women in this club are too fat. If they only knew what a spectacle they presented they would do anything to reduce their corpulency. Ladies," said he, becoming more and more personal, and looking right at the fat ladies in the front row, "if you only knew how abhorrent you are to every man of good taste, you'd take a little exercise. Perhaps you think you win admiration, but let me tell you that, with the exception of one aboriginal and savage tribe who adore women with gross hips, a fat woman is repulsive to all other men. You have lost your lines and you are inartistic and unnatural." There was no equivocation in that speech. It fairly staggered some of the fat women and the way some of them frowned and wrinkled their brows would have gladdened the heart of a beauty doctor out of a job.

Their Christmas Stunt

Mr. Harrison , by the way, is always worrying over his friends' health, and for the benefit of some of them has a swimming class at the Olympic Club. On Christmas morning he gave his class a most heroic stunt to accomplish. First they all walked to the Cliff, and there went into the surf. This is no unusual thing for Greer Harrison, however. On his sixtieth birthday, five or six years ago, he walked to San Jose. Though these long sprints agree with the veteran Olympian, not many of the youth of San Francisco care to keep up to his strenuous gait.

To Reduce Her Weight

Talking of reducing flesh, what do you think Kathryn Dillon has gone into for that purpose? Miss Dillon's superabundance of adipose tissue has been gradually becoming a burden to her, but she rejected with disdain all suggestions of a banting nature to keep down her avoirdupois. She is too fond of the good things of the table for that. Her method is ingenious and also pleasing. She is taking lessons in fancy dancing.

Her Repartee Is Parisian

Genevieve King is expected to make a big social inning in Pasadena, where she is visiting the Armsbys. Miss King is a very witty girl, and as much in demand at dinners and luncheons as Kate Clement and Laura McKinstry used to be. The French officers say she is witty even in French, which certainly shows the quality of her wit, as well as her French.

Lost to the World

That Jean Mackenzie is going into the missionary field must be rather a disappointment to her mother, who is very ambitious for her socially and financially. Although a clergyman's wife, Mrs. Mackenzie's ambitions tend toward acquiring laurels in the world rather than in heaven. She worked hard that her daughters might have Riverside orange groves for their dots, and the result is that each of the girls is worth about fifty thousand dollars. But Jean is going to be a missionary!

News From Abroad

Word comes to me from Paris that Florence Breckenridge is much better and that the famous brain specialists who have been consulted declare that, if she leads a very quiet life, she may recover. She is quite content to remain in the Vienna sanitarium for she knows it is for her own good. In her rational moments she discusses her madness with perfect intelligence. She receives her friends and goes to the theatre and opera. But occasionally she lapses into distressing melancholia. I hear that her mother, Mrs. Fred Sharon, hates Europe with a deadly hatred and would be glad to see the last of it. It was there she lost her only Sharon child, it was there Florence became insane, and there where she had all the worry with the young Jack Breckenridges, a trouble not yet ended.

Just a Year Ago It Was

Kathryn Du Val, who announced her engagement with Oliver Dibble last week, was once engaged to Lieutenant C. B. Stone. They were affianced in August and the affair was all off by the following October. At that time it was said that Miss Du Val had an affection for somebody else—but it wasn't Mr. Dibble, if I recollect aright. However, everything turns out for the best, and it is always well to be sure of one's own mind before tying the fatal knot. Miss Du Val is a sensible girl, and must be persuaded of a man's worthiness before marrying him.

Modest Stark

They are always telling good stories on the popular Zinkand orchestra leader but the latest one illustrates his modesty, of which nobody ever suspected him. It seems that while Stark was on his recent trip to New York he received an offer from a famous beer hall with which went a salary much larger than the one he is at present receiving. Stark thought with favor of the offer at first but when he visited the place, and found that he would be obliged to play behind a screen where his gyrations and pulchritude would not show, he declined the offer. He says that it lowers music "as an art" to hide it behind a screen or its plump interpreter behind a bushel.

The Busy Stork

The stork is still busy. He alighted on the roof tree of the Charles Barton Hills this week and left a baby boy. The Hills have only one other child, a daughter of fourteen, so the son and heir will have matters all his own way for awhile. I hear that the stork is winging his way toward the home of the "Gus" Taylors. This will be his first visit in that direction. The home of the Charles Pages has been brightened by the advent of a son. Mrs. Page was Louise Hoffacker. The long-legged bird is hovering over the Hawkes home on Russian Hill, and is again threatening to visit the Sam Shortridges.

The big polo match to be played in January will draw many Blingumites to Southern California. The Walter Martins are among those who will go down for it.

Mrs. Lawrence Poole gave a tea last week at which she entertained forty or fifty friends.

Not Her Line of Activity

A certain high-toned lawyer who prides himself upon professional honor and etiquette, received a sudden shock and deserved rebuke, the other day. This particular ornament to the "learned profession" lives at a certain club in town. He is contesting the will of a lady who died recentlly at a hospital in Sutter street. Among his club friends is a business man who recently underwent an operation for appendicitis. The business man discovered a pleasant acquaintance in his dignified nurse, and, in a modest and gentlemanly bachelor way, sought to keep up the pleasant companionship he had found in the refined lady. While telling his legal club friend of his experience at the hospital, he spoke of the interesting nurse. The lawyer became deeply interested, for he wanted to have some detective work done at the hospital. He thought that it would be a brilliant stroke to engage the nurse as a spy, and he made a suggestion to that effect to the man of commerce. The latter thought it a good idea and 'phoned her to call on the attorney, thinking he wanted to see her on some professional business. When he told her that he wanted her to spy around among the nurses and pick up testimony bearing on his will contest, she indignantly told him that she did not care to engage in that sort of business. "But perhaps you can recommend some nurse who will accept employment," he said. "I know of no professional nurse who would accept that sort of employment," was the reply. Now the business man is sending flowers and apologetic notes in vain.

They Wanted Him Blackballed

Some of the members of the Pacific-Union Club complain that the institution has lost its exclusiveness; that men of doubtful standing in the community are no longer barred from membership. They are especially aggrieved over the election of a gentleman interested in promoting various enterprises. Strenuous objections were made to his election by members who had had business dealings with him, but the objections were overruled. The affected exclusiveness of San Francisco clubs is one of the amusing features of life in this gay metropolis. There is not a club in San Francisco that does not number among its members individuals who are far from being models of propriety and integrity. Some of our most conspicuous club men are boors, quite a few are bounders, and even an occasional blackguard is to be met with in clubdom. But if there weren't a few sinners among the saints, what a dreadfully wearisome place the club would be.

A Rule that Restrains Cads

It is customary just before the holidays to put up the Christmas lists for the employes and servants at the various clubs. It is against the first principle of club etiquette to fee a servant. This is an axiom, though it is ignored by many of our clubmen of the snobbish variety. It is through the Christmas list that the employes of the clubs receive their extra compensation, and it is then that some of the bounders draw to themselves for a time the admiration of the servants, and perhaps, as a consequence, win a little extra attention. But in doing so they sacrifice their self-respect, if they have any. Vulgar ostentation of this sort is the hallmark of the cad. The Union Club of New York, which is the leading social organization of the country, and one to which very few San Francisco clubmen have the entree, has a rule that no member shall put himself down on the list for more than five dollars, and it is generally understood that this sum is the limit which each member donates. It is thus that invidious comparisons are avoided. It is a rule based upon the principle that a club should be a democracy and that within its portals all men should be equal.

A Pampered Spaniel

Mrs. Willis Norris, who recently left for her home in New York after spending a month in this city, is the proud owner of a pet spaniel which travels on a special Pullman car pass. Other dogs ride in the baggage car but Mrs. Norris's spaniel sleeps in a Pullman berth. Mr. Norris is a railroad man. Mrs. Norris was formerly Mary Banning of Los Angeles, sister of Mrs. Lucy Banning Bradbury.

Her Fortune Gone

By the death in Boston of Edward C. Hodges I was reminded of the beautiful Ethel Davis, his wife, who was the sister of Willis Davis. Her first husband was Hans Kohler. When she became Mrs. Hodges she was possessed of a fortune of a quarter of a million which was dissipated by unfortunate speculation. She separated from her second husband a year ago and now she is a fashionable milliner in New York.

The Clarke Family

"Ed" Clarke, who returned from a two years' trip abroad to fall into the clutches of the "sweet pea girl," is destined to find his latest escapade the most expensive of all his previous primrose path adventures. Nearly all the members of the Clarke family have had a checkered career since the death of their father, which occurred about ten years ago in a private sanitarium. Lottie Clarke married the man of her choice, "Gus" Moulder, and after a few years of alternating bliss and discord was divorced in order to take unto herself a second husband in the person of Leslie Wright, brother of ex-Speaker Wright of the Assembly. Mrs. Wright is now traveling in Europe and the ocean separates her from her husband. The other daughter, Edith, married a retired army officer, and the ocean is usually kept between them.

Will Have a Model Boarding House

Rose Hooper always showed business acumen above the average for a woman. She inherited her financial head from her father, the late Major W. B. Hooper, who managed the Occidental for so many years. His daughter Rose, after studying miniature painting in Paris, perfected her art to such an extent that when she returned here she commanded high prices for her little portraits. She accumulated a bank account of her own, independent of the allowance her father gave her. Now, since her marriage with Mr. Platner, this clever young woman has found another field of activity. I hear that the Platners are to open a model boarding-house, on the most up-to-date plan. One of its features will be a padded room. Don't start, now! the room's object is most humane. It will be for small children and babies, where their nurses can watch over them while their parents are otherwise engaged. The plan may not materialize, but it is being talked up, and will doubtless be one of the realities of the New Year.

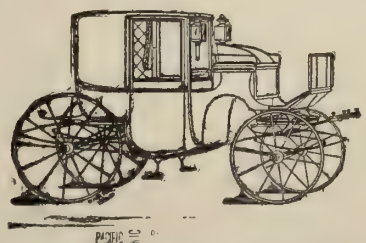
Would Be a Leader

Mrs. Breedon's small tea last Friday for her friend, Mrs. Jules Brett, was a very cheerful affair. Mrs. Breedon, by the way, is one of the most active hostesses in society this winter. Not a week passes that she does not give some sort of an entertainment, either at her home, the University Club or the Palace. She is extremely fond of society and is not one of those who dub formal dinners and dances a bore. It is hinted that she would like to be a leader, and there is no reason why she should not aspire to that dignity, for she has all the essentials.

Enter—A Baroness

The arrival of the Baroness Nugent in town gives her sister, Mrs. Burns Macdonald, another motif for entertaining, in which she so delights. The Baroness, who is one of the Younger girls, has not been in San Francisco in years. She was married abroad and her home is, I believe, in Austria. A younger sister also married a foreign nobleman. I have heard that Baron Nugent is not wholly Austrian, but part English, being a relative of Lord Southampton. The Younger girls all had comfortable dots, inherited from their own mother, who died when they were quite young. Fifty or sixty thousand dollars each was their inheritance. The only one of the girls still unmarried is Maud, who was at last accounts engaged in Social Settlement work in New York. During the Spanish war she became engaged to a New York physician, one of Roosevelt's Rough Riders, but it was broken off. Dr. and Mrs. Younger have lived in Paris ever since he gave up his practice in Chicago. He is now the leading dentist in the gay French capital.

Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels has been entertaining quite a bit this winter, but she usually has about the same set at her affairs. She gave a luncheon last Thursday to Mrs. Chauncey Winslow, Mrs. Robert Oxnard, Mrs. Gus Taylor and a few others of that clique.



She—That waiter is a good guesser, isn't he?
He—I don't know. Why do you think so?
She—He was so quick in guessing what you meant when you tried to tell him in French what you wanted.

Williams in Command

Some time ago "whispering" Gavin McNab and Jimmy Phelan were in great glee over the report that Tom Williams, business manager of the Examiner, had been divested of his peacock feather by William R. Hearst, and that he was in danger of losing his job. They intimated that Hearst had assured them that Williams was to be shelved, and that he had sent Carvalho out from the East to clip Williams's wings. Since then the Examiner's business manager has been enjoying a vacation in Europe with his family at the expense of Mr. Hearst, and now the report comes to me from New York that he is exercising supreme authority over all the Hearst papers. I am told that even Carvalho, who was supposed to control the financial policy of the Hearst papers, is subordinate to Williams. There is no man in the employ of William R. Hearst so devoted to his interests as Tom Williams, and there is none more capable of guiding the destinies of the string of yellow journals, and therefore the story of his elevation is quite plausible. But he will seriously object to being held in the East. The probability is that he will stay there long enough to complete arrangements for the launching of the new papers, one in Boston and one in Washington.

When Francis L. H.—otherwise "Cosy"—Noble left his job of Sunday editor of the New York World, Bob Davis also departed. The Joke Journalistic

The Bulletin is setting a fast pace for its contemporaries in the newspaper field these days. Not satisfied with compelling attention by publishing all the news worth reading, this enterprising evening journal has resorted to the catch-penny prize-contest scheme which has ever proved alluring bait in the newspaper world. That sort of thing usually savors of the hand-me-down type of commercialism, but reputable journalists the world over have found it profitable, and as a first aid to stagnant circulation it is now regarded as a highly proper expedient. The Bulletin's prize contests are exceptionally interesting because they involve an element of humor. The proprietor of the Bulletin dearly loves a joke, and he recently put all his acquaintances on a broad grin by advertising that a certain serial story which he was publishing furnished a clue to seven bags of gold with which he expected to stimulate interest. A great many unsophisticated people became absorbed in the story without seeing the joke which was really on them. Now the Bulletin readers are in the throes of another contest which involves a literary effort. Among the judges selected to pass on the merits of the compositions to be submitted is Frank Dunne of the Superior Court. According to the Bulletin, he "is a recognized authority on belles lettres"—a capital joke. The judge doesn't know any more about literature than a pug dog does about Euclid. He isn't even familiar with the literature of his profession. An architect named Tharp is also one of the Bulletin's "lit'ry" judges—the same Tharp, I am told, who desecrated the Dewey monument with vile orthography. The third is Judge Max Sloss, a man of culture, who will probably be put to the necessity of filing a dissenting opinion. The selection of Judge Sloss was a joke on the other two.

Sidney to Wear the Mantle

Mrs. Salisbury may be unable to appear at her next dance, which is to take place at the Palace December thirtieth. Her son Sidney will do the honors for the occasion in her absence. He will receive the guests and do all that mamma Salisbury did when on deck. This social distinction will fall gracefully on the shoulders of young Salisbury whose ambition is to follow in the footsteps of his mother. His friends proudly declare that he can make a girl's position in society by dancing with her or mar it by refusing. How worthy of the ambition of the young American is such power! But after all, social leadership is a trade that may be quite lucrative. For instance, I am told that one thousand dollars was paid in behalf of one of this winter's debutantes, to a woman skilled in the art of boosting the climber. This debutante is receiving more fulsome newspaper flattery than all the others combined.

The Question Settled

The decision of the Supreme Court affirming the power of the Mayor to remove in all cases in which he has power to appoint, sustains my view of the charter which I expressed in these columns some months ago, when I discussed the paradoxical decision of Judge Sloss in the Board of Health case. I pointed out at that time the absurdity of the Sloss decision, and declared that Eugene Schmitz did not dare seek judicial determination of the question in the Supreme Court, because his power would be defined in a way that would render it impossible for him to escape responsibility for the shortcomings of the municipal government. The recent decision proved that there was a way of having the question settled, but it was not shifty Eugene who found it, nor thrifty Abe who pointed it. It now remains to be seen how that brace of spectacular charlatans will continue to hoodwink the public.

Eugene's End In Sight

Though the decision appears to be highly advantageous to the Mayor, it is a blessing to the public. It means that when Eugene reaches the end of his term his power will be gone. According to the interpretation of the law before the rendering of that decision, the appointees of Schmitz would hold office until their terms expired, and he would therefore continue to be a factor in politics for several years, just as Phelan has been a factor because of the presence of his appointees on the various commissions. But according to the Supreme Court's decision Mayor Schmitz's successor will have the power to sweep the entire Schmitz-Ruef gang out of office. The decision does not give Schmitz any more power than he was to be clothed with after the first of the year, because the several commissions were to have come under his control. He will now have more jobs to distribute but no greater control of the situation.

Santa Clauses in Petticoats

Miss Jennie Flood played Santa Claus in her usual lavish way this year, and many homes were gladdened by her bounty. She always gives presents to her employes that amount to thousands of dollars, and her wedding presents to friends easily run into a fortune every year. Mrs. Blanding is also a Santa Claus whose servants and poor relations think cannot be duplicated this side of fairyland.

The George Newhalls were frequently seen last week rushing about among the shops buying pretty and expensive things. They are a most devoted couple and did their shopping in unison. Mrs. Newhall is wearing a stunning velvet street suit of blue, her favorite color, trimmed with brown fur in bands. The frock is made with that loose bloused Paris effect which is so popular. A hat of the old Colonial shape goes with the suit. That style went out some time since but is evidently to be revived.

One sees many pretty, modish frocks worn on the holiday shopping tours. Mrs. George Pope was out the other day in a fur-trimmed black velvet which was very becoming. Mrs. Latham McMullin's Gibsonesque style is intensified by her walking suit, a blue invisible plaid, worn with a toque en suite, and an unusually large collarette of mink, with muff trimmed with tails. Miss Alice Hager is looking well in a dark blue cloth tailor suit, with mink stole and muff. Muffs seem absurd to Eastern visitors and tourists from the cold sections. They wonder why anybody wears furs when there is no snow on the ground. One rarely sees muffs covering New York women's hands, unless on very frigid days.

They've Not Set a Date

No date has yet been set for the marriage of Miss Edith Findley and George Gardiner, but it has been said it will take place some time in the spring. Some of their friends appear to be in doubt as to whether a date will ever be set. Mr. Gardiner's fiancee is the handsomest of the four Findley sisters, one of whom is a Mrs. Lusk of St. Louis. Another sister, Alice, recently became the bride of Captain Cloke, U. S. A. Miss Findley lately returned from Europe where she had spent some time with Mrs. Schmiedell, and her engagement was announced on her arrival here. Mr. Gardiner has been her devoted swain for years, but she has had a great many admirers. The announcement of her engagement was a surprise.

A Californian Dinner in Gotham

My New York correspondent writes me of quite a notable gathering of Californians that assembled in John F. Harrold's Elizabethan studio on Thursday of last week. The occasion was a dinner and musicale in honor of Mrs. Emery Pottle, Juliet Wilbor Tompkins that was. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. Pottle, Gelett Burgess, Lloyd Osbourne, Miss Geraldine Bonner, Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, J. O'Hara Cosgrave, Mrs. Trask, Mrs. Warde, Mrs. Bellville, Edgar Leventritt, Robert G. Mackay, Count Luigi Corti of Milan, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Stoppani, Mrs. Frank Norris and Lesley Martin. Nearly all of these, including the host, formerly lived in San Francisco.

Another Trust Breaks In

The Smelting Trust, I am told, has at length entered the Californian field. The entrance has been made by way of Tonopah. The railroad now being built into that mining district is controlled by the Guggenheims of New York and they dominate the Smelting Trust. They will therefore handle all the ore, and as a consequence the Selby Smelting Company will lose a great deal of business which would naturally have come to that corporation.

There were the usual number of Christmas dinners, most of them being family affairs as is the usual thing at this season. Others, however, were of a formal nature, with invited guests. Of course the turkey was the piece de resistance, for the roast beef of Old England is not the American's choice for his Christmas feast. It was noted that while formerly different wines were served with the various courses, in the English style, this year champagne was the rule. The sparkling wine always promotes good fellowship, especially when Ayala is the brand served.

Not a Rough House Function

Mrs. Bowie-Dietrick having announced that she was going to give a novel entertainment next week, to be known as a "winter picnic," somebody started the report that it was to be a rough-house affair. It is to be merely a dance with amusing picnic features, and was probably suggested by the recent jinks of the Concordia Club. Those invited to the affair have been asked to appear in duck costumes. The drawing-room furniture will be replaced by rustic seats and moss-covered logs, but there will be no sign pointing to Lover's Lane.

The Gay Practical Joker

The little story related in last Sunday's Call about Dr. Clarence Tillman and the Chinese cooks would be a very good one if it did not lack some elements of veracity. The practical joke therein described was not an occurrence of last week but took place over a decade of years ago, and the sufferer was not Dr. Tillman, but his father, Walter F. Tillman. The perpetrators were Thomas Connell, now the Call representative in Oakland, and John Morrison. The pair were known as the most inveterate practical jokers in the Mission. Connell and Morrison spent an entire Saturday afternoon going the rounds of the Chinese employment offices and hiring cooks who were to report at the Tillman residence on Sunday. All day long the Mongolian invasion kept up. About every fifteen minutes the door bell would ring, and a new cook would report for business, until at last, in desperation, the Tillmans locked up the house and escaped. On another occasion when a small-pox epidemic was raging, Morrison disguised himself one frosty Christmas Eve, wrapped up in a blanket, and then broke in upon a group of late Yuletide revelers. He inquired the way to the small-pox hospital, and explained that he thought he felt symptoms of the disease. Needless to say that some jolly good fellows made for home sooner that night than they might otherwise have done.

Gossip from Stockton

The Stockton Daughters of the American Revolution did a graceful thing in presenting their retiring Regent, Mrs. J. J. Tully, a handsome silver loving cup. Mrs. Tully has been the most wide-awake and up-to-date Regent the Stockton Chapter has had and it was a matter for regret when she declined a renomination. There were some few whispers of envy following the success of last winter's Bal Poudre, which Mrs. Tully mothered to a brilliant finish. Mrs. John E. Budd succeeds Mrs. Tully and will be a capable, pleasing officer. She has an even temperament and a great deal of tact, all of which make her personally popular. She is the wife of University Regent John E. Budd.

The Reward of Courtesy

C. J. Jones, who was recently called from Sacramento by the Southern Pacific Company to act as Freight Agent in this city, writes my Stockton correspondent, is one of those rare individuals who can please the patrons of the railroad and yet remain loyal to the best interests of the corporation. This is his second promotion in two years. He served the company as Freight and Passenger Agent at Stockton for about ten years, and when he was called to Sacramento to fill a position created for him—that of Division Freight and Passenger Agent—the merchants, shippers of various kinds and all patrons of the road at Stockton felt the deepest regret. They did an unusual thing when they presented him with a testimonial of their regard, a magnificent chest of solid silver. Such cordial relations do not often exist between the people and a representative of the "Octopus."

Miss Peters's Christmas Party

A Christmas party out of the ordinary was given by Genevieve Peters in Stockton this week. Miss Peters's guests were not from Stockton's exclusives, but they enjoyed themselves far more than that blase product of civilization could have done. They had a Christmas tree and a delightful feast was spread for them. Besides this they had a free ride to the house, by courtesy of the street railway company. There's no secret about the generous-hearted hostess's guests—they were the little tots from the Children's Home. Miss Peters dispensed the hospitalities of the family residence to the children in the bountiful and generous manner which is her characteristic.

Her Correspondence to be Exposed

Word comes from New York that Mrs. Peter T. Dickinson (Hester E. Benedict, of Oakland), who is spending the winter with her son, Harry Dickinson, is about to have published a collection in book form of the letters of her niece, the late Mrs. Nellie Gore, whose alleged murder in Paris, by the Russian opera singer and favorite of the Czar and Czarina, Serge de Redenzski, nearly brought about complications between this country and France. Redenzski certainly had great influence with the Russian Government, but whether it came from his voice, which is described as one of the best in Europe, or whether it was from the love that the royal couple bore his brother, who is the favorite attendant of the Czar, no one seemed to know. Certain it is, though, that only the interposition of the American Minister, backed by powerful influence from Mexico and New York, prevented the Russians from consigning the beautiful American woman to quick-lime. In these letters, written in the delicately familiar tone of a refined gentlewoman to one who stood in the place of a mother to her, Redenzski is described fairly and at length. There are, in the book, piano exercises written by one of the best teachers of Vienna for the daily use of the writer; and there are exquisitely humorous accounts of various interviews with masters of piano craft, while seeking for instruction with them. Mrs. Gore declared that in order to get a hearing from one of these famous and clever men one must have credentials that would admit one to any foreign court; and that after gaining a hearing a student must be as proficient as any concert player of America. Then, if the maestro is satisfied with the applicant's work, and character and earnestness of purpose, he will hand her over to a preparatory teacher—who must be an artist—for two or three years of hard study. In addition to all this, Mrs. Gore's letters are full of delightful interviews with great people in the world of art, and descriptions of places that are interesting from many standpoints. The critics who have seen the manuscript predict for the book an unprecedented sale.

Detectives After Him

The Federal officials who were hot on the trail of Walter Dimmick, the ex-Mint employe, are now trying to locate the loot which he is supposed to have taken. Not long ago detectives appeared in Santa Barbara and insisted upon digging up the garden of Judge Wright, who is the father-in-law of Walter Dimmick. As Dimmick has not been in Santa Barbara since the thefts, the supposition was that Mrs. Dimmick or the Wrights had concealed the money. The Wrights are people of the very highest standing in the community and the entire town was ablaze with wrath at the insult cast upon them. The search resulted as search for buried treasure generally does. Clever Oaklanders

Elizabeth Gray, the talented sister of Mabel Thayer Gray of Ebell, the youngest club president in America, objects, it is said, to being referred to as "Mabel Gray's sister." Elizabeth Gray has talent of her own, and she does not care to flicker fitfully in reflected glory. She is becoming well known to readers of all the standard magazines as a clever short story writer. Speaking of literary women I am reminded that Margaret Cameron has a book of "Comedies and Short Plays" out this month. This brilliant and versatile writer is spending her latest honeymoon in Rome. It is amusing when you think of it—isn't it?—how many honeymoons come to one person.

The Impulsive Boycotter

We imagine that the autocrat of the labor union is more rampantly aggressive in San Francisco than elsewhere in this favored and prosperous country. But that is a delusion due to the meagreness of the press despatches from that other great centre of labor unionism on the shores of Lake Michigan. Last week some passengers on a Chicago street car refused to pay their fares to the conductor, because he didn't wear a button. They beat him into unconsciousness, and were inclined to take the same interest in the motorman, but not being a controversialist and having great confidence in his sprinting ability, he exhibited a fleet pair of heels to the strenuous exponents of a great principle. The police of Chicago were finally constrained to take a hand in the proceedings, and they participated in time to save the life of the buttonless wage-earner. Meanwhile, however, the car was badly smashed, probably because it did not wear the union label. The wearers of the button are not more impulsive in Chicago than they are in this city, but at present the local enthusiasts have little occasion to become aggressive. However they are doing their best to incite store-keepers along Market street to deeds of violence, and incidentally to intimidate prospective patrons of boycotted establishments. But ostensibly they are conducting a peaceful boycott, and the police, having great respect for the sympathies of Mayor Schmitz, make little effort to disperse the mobs that assemble on the streets to encourage the representatives of organized labor.

The Exclusion of Spencer

The Evening Post of this city, edited as it is by a learned son of Oxford, is presumed to be an authority in all matters pertaining to the rules and customs of British institutions. It is therefore with considerable reluctance that I beg leave to amend the explanation of my esteemed contemporary regarding the reason of the exclusion of the body of Herbert Spencer from Westminster Abbey. "It was not," says the Post, "due to any disposition on the part of those who control the Abbey to discriminate against him. It was as a matter of fact based entirely upon religious grounds. The bodies of unbelievers cannot be stowed away in Westminster Abbey, and Spencer was an unbeliever." Spencer was an unbeliever in the sense in which Charles Darwin was an unbeliever, and yet the great doors of the Abbey were thrown open to the coffin of that distinguished scientist. Spencer never aroused the antagonism of churchmen so bitterly as did Darwin. The Dean of Westminster has supreme power in the matter, and the functionary now occupying that position was bound neither by tradition nor precedent to forbid the admission of Herbert Spencer's remains to the English Pantheon. The fact is that the British public is no respecter of mere thinkers. To title only, whether it is worn by a soldier, a statesman or a mere accident of nobility, does the British public make obeisance. Spencer cared nothing for officialdom during his lifetime, and therefore the Dean of Westminster was not awed by his dust.

Jangled Bells in Tune Again

Miss Vesta Shortridge did not stay long in New York. She is looking much improved in health since her Eastern trip. When in Gotham she and Emil Bruguiere patched up their misunderstanding, and wedding bells will soon ring for them, as Mr. Bruguiere has also returned home. He made lots of money this year, and has spent the greater part of it for bric-a-brac and furniture for his new home, which will probably be located in Monterey.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Stetson, with Marguerite Doe, have gone to Mexico. The change, it is hoped, will be of benefit to Mrs. Stetson's health, which has not been robust for a month. Little Marguerite speaks Spanish well and will act as interpreter during the trip.

Oakland's Latest Freak Society

Oakland, aided and abetted by the sages of the college town of Berkeley, is urging the enactment of an anti-osculation ordinance. Really, it would make a mummy laugh to hear the learned dissertations on the iniquity of the practice. And meanwhile, in the dim corners of palm-lined stairways, under the becoming dimness of rose-shaded candles in my lady's boudoir, and—oh, in a hundred other places, kisses are being pressed upon pouting lips and upon dimpled white shoulders, just as they have been since the days in Eden when Adam folded Eve to his heart and told her, between kisses manifold, that she was the sweetest of all God's numerous gifts to him. It is characteristic of Oakland to start the "National Anti-Osculation Society of America." Oakland is a hot-bed of reformers and cranks. The "National Anti-Osculation Society of America" is not satisfied to take from a man's life the ecstasy of a sweetheart's kiss; it also condemns, as baneful, the sacred kiss of the mother. "Anti-Osculation"—forbidding sound! It bears a chill in its very breath. It would be a good idea to have it framed and placed above the portals of boarding-schools where no treatment is considered too rigorous for youth.

Spooning is Tabu

A. S. Rutherford is the local secretary of the society. He assails the practice of kissing with facts and theories from medical authorities, with unromantic statements, and with cold and prosy logic. Mr. Rutherford has a certain method in his crusade. He believes that it is more important to corral the "kisser" than the "kissee" and therefore he avows, openly and shamelessly, that he would rather bring under his influence the men than the women. As kissing is preluded by sighs, tender phrases and clasping of hands, with other demonstrations of affection, which are indulged in alike by the wise and foolish when under the subtle influence of the infatuation, Mr. Rutherford would do away with all tender demonstrations. For this reason he has attached to his anti-kissing pledge certain minor or secondary pledges which are set forth with due solemnity on the engrossed membership card. Thus the preface to initiation as a member of the National Anti-Osculation Society of America includes a promise "to abstain from the use for purposes of attraction, allurement or fascination, of all such facial expressions and contortions as are known and designated by the names of 'cat's eyes; sheep's eyes; goo-goo eyes,' winks, blushes or other designing alterations of countenance." The member also binds himself "not to make use of any term of endearment, such as 'lovey, sweetness, onliest, littlest, birdie, tootsey-wootsey, dovey,' etc., to any one whether a member of the organization or not."

The Solemn Pledge

The main part of the pledge is portentously set forth in large type, which proclaims incidentally the sanity of the pledge and declares that: "This is to certify that John Smith, being of sound mind and sense and in full possession of personal liberty, does with the unfaltering courage of conviction, and a heroic desire to promote and preserve the happiness and freedom of the human race generally, hereby solemnly swear to forego, renounce and abjure forever all pleasures, gratification or enjoyment to be derived from the use and practice of the art of osculation, commonly known as kissing." Mr. Rutherford, who lives at 1224 Adelina street, Oakland, says that he has issued about five hundred certificates in Alameda county, already. He admits that he has indulged in the practice of kissing, which practice he now desires to have placed among the lost arts. Although he will not say that his aversion to the sweet practice is due to an affair of the heart, or confess that some fair one's kisses have turned as waters of Marah on his lips, he affirms, with all solemnity, that he has foresworn the pleasant paths of amorous dalliance and that, hereafter, he will tread only the stony highway of perfect and uncompromising common sense. Poor man! After all, he is really to be pitied! To be condemned to do without the caress of lips of mother, maiden, wife or child! Again, poor Mr. Rutherford! It occurs to me that he must have associated with hard-hearted maidens or with those totally devoid of the poesy of existence. After all, Mr. Secretary of the Anti-Osculation Society, I'll wager that you are either too old or too awfully, awfully homely, or else that you are a crank. That's it! You are a crank of cranks and can find no girl amiable enough to permit your kisses. Well, you deserve to be consigned to the solitary membership of your own pernicious society.

Some of the Converts

Those whom Mr. Rutherford has entangled in the meshes of the "National Anti-Osculation Society of America" are: Miss Pauline Warfield, North Berkeley; Miss Hattie Dobbins, Elmhurst; Miss Winnie Loedbetter, Fruitvale; Miss Ellen Brooks, 1728 Fifteenth street, Oakland; A. A. Forster, Haywards; Miss Bertha Ellerly, Berkeley; Miss Jessie Wright, Oakland; Miss T. B. Smith, Fruitvale; Miss R. C. Harris, Berkeley; Miss Georgiana Briggs, 919 Center street, Oakland; Miss L. Ladies, Beware!

Smartly dressed women are fighting shy of Mrs. Robert Watt of Madison street, Oakland, and it is not because she is not "too sweet for anything." They say she is all that—and more. She is credited with having the faculty of "talking the birds off the trees." Mrs. Watt is widely known for her charities, and as president of the West Oakland Club, she has done a great deal of good work. But she is so sweet about it! One of the most exclusive and wealthiest of the society girls declares that it is due to her particular set that the mechanics' wives in West Oakland are enabled to wear gowns that are of richer material and better made than most women in the ordinary walks of life would think of owning. Said she, in speaking of the philanthropist: "It is dangerous to let that dear old Mrs. Watt get her eye on a new gown or on even a particularly chic chiffon waist. And if you are fortunate enough to own a particularly frivolous negilege, take my advice and don't let her white bejeweled fingers close over it, for whisk! it will be off your back and in a West End Settlement 'Rubbish' Sale before you have recovered your breath. She is a dear old thing, but take the advice of one who has fallen a victim to her wiles and keep a clutch on your own clothes."

The Touch Artistic

F. M. Smith, of borax reputation, has a kindly spot in his big heart for the honest and ambitious young man, and it is told of him that, several years ago, he assisted a struggling young miner in a venture which subsequently turned out a failure. A month ago the man, who in the meantime had located a good prospect but needed money for its development, again approached the "Borax King" for funds with which to carry on the enterprise. Mr. Smith listened patiently to his tale, half inclined to again risk his money. "The burnt child dreads the fire," said he, slowly, in explanation of his hesitancy.

"But he need not freeze to death," retorted the miner, who, it is said, is in the North at present, using Smith's money to put machinery into the mine.

Adelphian Club Affairs

And now comes the Adelphian Club of Alameda with a scheme for a new club house. It needs one badly enough, for the ramshackle old entrance of the hall where it has its rooms at present would humble the pride of anything less superbly sure of and contented with itself than is this organization. And I have heard it whispered that there is likely to be as a big a row over this building site as the one that agitates the Ebell Society of Oakland. And the half has not been told regarding that row. The women on the inside are as close as political conspirators. But as to the Adelphians, they are harmonious enough at their monthly teas, but, of course, when the pocket-book is affected it is a very different story. It is proposed that the different sections shall have fairs and musicals, etc., to start the ball rolling toward a grand new club house. The Music Section is planning a concert by the ensemble class of August Hinrichs, to take place early in January. The funds raised by this concert are, I believe, to form the nucleus of a building fund. It is hinted that a number of these concerts may be given, but the trouble lies with the people. At first they fairly bubble with enthusiasm and make all kinds of promises—and that ends it. That was how the "Chamber Concerts," which started so grandly last year, were so dismal a failure toward the end.

The Latest Lion From Abroad

The Crocker clan in New York is entertaining a social lion in the person of Lord Brooke. He is the guest of Mrs. Charles B. Alexander. Lord Brooke expects to come to this city later on. He is a very young man and the son and heir of the Earl of Warwick. His mother is the beautiful and accomplished Countess of Warwick, one of the most notable of English hostesses. Unlike most foreign noblemen who visit this country, Lord Brooke is not in quest of an American heiress. He is very wealthy and has no old castles to mend or family jewelry to take out of pawn. He is only twenty-one years of age and is a lieutenant of the First Life Guards. He is coming to this side of the Rockies in search of big game.

Though She Refused Him

Miss Eleanor Warner went to Los Angeles with Mrs. Frederick Horne, formerly Alma McClung, and will remain there for the wedding of Miss Lena Sefton of San Diego and Franklin Webster Wakefield. An unusual feature of the coming wedding will be Miss Warner's role of bridesmaid at the wedding of a man whom she formerly refused to marry. She promised to be a sister to him and they decided to be friends. She has since promised to be a bridesmaid for the one of his later choice and will be a beautiful addition to the bridal party. Miss Warner is a cousin of Miss Helen Davis and a noted beauty.

Miss Marie Wells has just returned from a visit with Mrs. Truxtun Beale at Bakersfield.

The Family Club will have its Christmas jinks tonight.

Learning the Naval Trade

At last the California Naval Militia appears to have awakened to the need of making itself something more than a means of personal exploitation. It has taken a step toward becoming a source from which the Navy may draw reinforcement in time of war. There has been formed a class of officers which is to receive lessons in navigation from a Naval Academy graduate, Mr. John T. McMillan, formerly a lieutenant in the United States Navy. I believe that ten members of the organization are now in the class, which is instructed by Mr. McMillan three evenings in the week. No better selection could have been made for an instructor, for McMillan combines the practical with the theoretical to an extent only found in men drilled in the national naval school, and I understand that his pupils are already showing considerable progress. In this connection I may mention the fact that an effort is being made by the Navy Department to have the present Congress legislate with a view of having the Naval Militia brought under some sort of national control requiring of its members some test of proficiency, some dividend upon the material of war furnished them gratis in the shape of costly arms, ammunition and ships. Let the good work go on. The example set by the handful of ambitious men in McMillan's class should be followed by others, until the California Naval Militia becomes something that may be a credit to the State.

The Impotency of Colombia

Senator Morgan's obstructive resolution in the Panama matter has several fallacies expressed in it, not the least of which is a clause asserting that Colombia, "if not prevented by some powerful nation, is manifestly able to maintain her present effort to repress the secession." Rubbish! She is "manifestly" unable to do anything of the kind. She was unable to repress the last rebellion, which ended a year ago, until she purchased a ship in the United States, armed it with foreign weapons and manned it with Americans, which she could not have done had the revolting Liberals, most of whom were from Panama, been recognized as belligerents. Recognition precludes the enlisting of outside aid. Now Panama has been recognized by nearly all the nations, and Colombia would be unable to buy a single musket or enlist a single man outside her own borders. She is more heavily handicapped now than ever before, and a prolonged guerrilla war is all that she is capable of.

What Does It Mean?

Intense curiosity, not unmingled with foreboding, has been aroused by a remarkable circular recently issued by the War Department to the Army officers on duty in Washington. It reads:

"You are requested to send to this office, as soon as practicable, the names of your children between the ages of six and seventeen years.

"W. P. Hall, Acting Adjutant-General."

What on earth it means is a mystery that deepened when it was learned that the Navy had been similarly notified. Whether the President was collecting race-suicide statistics, or evolving some theory of a co-relation between conjugal and military activity, or probing into some other hitherto unexplored realm of economics, the flustered officers are unable to determine. Latest advices inform me that the census is still in progress, the enumerators busy, and the problem unsolved.

A Highball is tasteless unless the whisky is of the best brand. Try a Chapin & Gore highball if you want something delightful.

Where the Line Is Drawn

While several colored cadets have graduated from West Point, such a thing has never happened at Annapolis. Years ago, two or three colored midshipmen were appointed to that school, but they did not remain long, and the Navy has therefore never had a colored officer. Not only did the colored men appointed not take naturally to the seafaring life, but the sentiment of their white associates was so violently opposed to them that the experiment has not been repeated during the last thirty-odd years. I believe the last one was a man who indirectly caused the dismissal of a popular white midshipman, one of the Maryland Claudes, as a result of the latter's positive refusal to fence with him. The color line is still rigidly drawn at Annapolis. A short time ago Midshipman Hugh C. Fry, of North Carolina, rebuked a negro servant by throwing a glass at him. Fry was dismissed, but his conduct was condoned by the people of his State and he was promptly re-appointed by Congressman H. W. Hitchings.

Hates to Tear Himself Away

It is said that Colonel J. J. O'Connell of the Thirtieth Infantry has been using all the influence he possesses to keep his regiment in San Francisco instead of going to the station named for it, Fort Reno, Oklahoma. Colonel O'Connell was stationed in San Francisco with the First Infantry for so many years it is but natural that he has come to look upon California as his home. But the Twenty-eighth Infantry which is assigned to the Presidio is not anxious to go farther on, so no doubt Colonel O'Connell will have to move. Among the officers of the Twenty-eighth Infantry is Captain Thomas A. Pierce whose marriage with Miss Minnie Burton, daughter of Inspector General George H. Burton, U. S. A., was one of the events of the season several years ago. Captain Charles Lyman Bent, who married Miss Ethel Cohen, another well known member of local society, is also an officer of the Thirtieth Infantry.

Her Psychic Power

Apropos of the debut of Miss Cornelia Kempff, the charming daughter of Admiral Kempff, I am told that she is possessed of psychic power. It is related that a day or two before the Wakefields were to arrive home from Honolulu, on the ill-fated steamer Rio de Janeiro, a party of young people sat in the parlor of the Metropole hotel in Oakland discussing the expected return of the family. The only silent member of the group was Miss Cornelia Kempff, then a little girl. Knowing of her great affection for Miss Wakefield, one of the girls said:

"Are you not glad that your playmate, Naomi, is so soon to be with us, Cornelia?"

With a look of sadness, the young girl replied: "She will never be with us again."

When urged, after the tragedy, to give a reason for her remark she would not make reply, but since then it has been said that she had a presentiment of the ship's doom.

General C. A. Woodruff and Mrs. Woodruff, whose absence from the Army colony in San Francisco for some time past has been felt, have returned to the city, and have taken apartments at the Hotel Cecil for the winter.

To Revive Vice-Admiralty

From my Washington correspondent I learn that the Navy Department contemplates recommending to Congress a reorganization scheme for the Navy containing several radical features. While it is not expected that the present session of Congress will create a General Staff for the Navy, analogous to that of the Army, it is believed that some of the Navy Department's new ideas will be put into practice. One of the most interesting of the proposed steps is the revival of the grade of Vice-Admiral, it being understood that the Department wishes three Vice-Admirals created. It is said to be the President's intention, should Congress acquiesce, to nominate Rear-Admirals Robley D. Evans, H. C. Taylor and Bowman H. McCalla for the three vacancies. At any rate, there is an undercurrent of opinion that these are the officers slated for the billets. All three are high in Administration esteem, although every one knows that there is no love lost between "Harry" Taylor and the other two. "Bob" Evans's selection for a vice-admiralty would certainly meet with popular approval, and the powerful "pull" that Evans, Taylor and McCalla all control would appear to be sufficient to overcome any opposition, should such appear.

Grief in Naval Families

One of the most striking instances of the uncertainty of the naval officer's life, which is more marked nowadays than it has been for many years, is furnished by the case of the monitor Wyoming. It was supposed by everyone that this vessel would be kept for all of her days in American sea ports, and when Commander V. L. Cottman was assigned to her, he and his officers naturally looked forward to a long term of sea duty spent comfortably and conveniently in San Francisco harbor, where the Wyoming was virtually billed as the local station ship. Her unlooked for dispatch to Panama came as a shock to all on board of her, as well as to the families of the officers, who had become cozily ensconced on shore. It appears that the Wyoming is now scheduled to be the station ship at distant, disagreeable Panama, to the sorrow of all her people and the grief of their relatives and friends. Six months ago all looked lovely, but it is now quite the reverse. Such is life in the navy.

Young Whitwell Found

Young Whitwell, the Harvard student, whose parents live in San Mateo and who disappeared so mysteriously from the university after drawing out all the money he had on deposit in a local bank, has been found. For many months his parents mourned him as dead, but he has been discovered living the life of a hermit in the mountains. It is not known as yet whether he is violently insane or not, but of course he must have something serious the matter with his headpiece.

A Pair for Every Day

The crack Beau Brummel of society should, by all accounts, be Gordon Blanding. He has three hundred and sixty-five pairs of trousers, one for every day in the year. Other Berry Walls of the local ton have to buy their tickets for the last row in the dress circle when Mr. Blanding is in the audience. And just fancy—there are really men in San Francisco who have to seclude themselves within their rooms while they send their lonely pair of trousers to be cleaned and pressed! Here's a chance for Mr. Blanding's philanthropy to assert itself.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Carnegie gave a large dinner recently in Washington, D. C., to the Board of Trustees of the Carnegie Institute. Among the guests were Judge and Mrs. W. W. Morrow.

Burton Holmes Coming

Few travelers can boast of the mileage which now stands to the credit of Mr. Burton Holmes, traveler, author and lecturer, for with the completion of his last summer's journey of seventeen thousand miles he can boast of having traveled in search of material for his illustrated lectures more than two hundred and sixty-seven thousand miles in his eleven years before the public. To those who are denied the pleasures of travel no more adequate substitute could be found than the travel talks of Mr. Holmes, for his trained brain and eye never failed to bring back from far-away lands the most vivid and valuable impressions of hat he has seen, for the benefit of the "stay-at-homes." His unusual ability as a photographer of keen artistic perceptions enables him to present to the eye, through the medium of his finely colored still pictures, and his realistic motion pictures, a valuable corroboration of his word pictures. At the Lyric hall, during the two weeks beginning January eleventh, Mr. Holmes will deliver two courses of five lectures each, the first giving his experiences last summer in the Yosemite, the Yellowstone, the Grand Canyon of Arizona, and through the Fjords of Alaska to Sitka and the White Pass, and from the White Horse Rapids down the entire length of the Yukon to the Klondike and Cape Nome. His second course, in marked contrast, will describe his journeyings by a new way around the world, the individual subjects being "St. Petersburg," "Moscow," "Siberia," "Peking," "Seoul, the Capital of Korea," All of the lectures of both courses will be magnificently illustrated with colored views and motion pictures from negatives by Mr. Holmes and his assistant and fellow traveler, Mr. Oscar Bennett Depue. Sale of course tickets opens Monday, January fourth, at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s. Prices for either course of five are $4,00, $3.00 and $2.00. Single lectures, $1.00, 75 cents and 50 cents. These will be on sale Thursday, January seventh.

Autocratic Songbirds

Manager Conreid of the Metropolitan Opera House does not believe in nursing the whims of the great operatic stars as did his predecessor, Mr. Grau. He has not only cut down expenses but he has accomplished a great deal for the future of opera in this country. Jean de Reszke refused as usual to sign a contract unless his brother Edouard was also engaged. Now Edouard has no voice and he is a very commonplace artist, and Conreid would have none of him. Therefore Jean is out of a job and Conreid has a better tenor in the person of Caruso. Mmes. Eames and Nordica held out for higher salaries and they were not engaged. As a consequence none of them is making any money. After awhile the singers will begin to realize that the Metropolitan Opera House is of some importance to them. Meanwhile Conreid's singers are standing by him bravely. Sembrich has sung six times in eleven days, and Gadski has appeared in big parts twice in two days.

She Will Return to London Soon

Madame Livorno, the palmist, has established a great reputation for herself in San Francisco, and is daily adding to it through the thorough knowledge of the art which she professes. There is nothing mysterious about this lady; and, apart from its instructive side, it is indeed a pleasure to have one's hand read by her. One can readily understand why she enjoys the friendship and esteem of her clients and why they do not fail—from the highest to the lowest—to acknowledge their appreciation of her talent. Madame Livorno will return to London in the spring.

In Financial Circles

Transactions in the Stock & Bond Exchange during the past week amounted to $119,000 bonds and 1,261 shares stock, divided into 380 Gas & Electric, 396 S. V. Water, 365 Miscellaneous, 15 Bank and 105 Sugar.

This is indeed a poor showing, even for a holiday week. Fluctuations were nominal, small selling orders having the effect of depressing the market, while on the other hand small buying orders raised prices.

Bank of California stock on a sale of five shares reached the lowest figure ($446 1-2) since the issue of the new stock. A sale of ten shares of Safe Deposit Company's stock scored the highest figure reached so far ($150). The supply of Alaska Packers seems to be more than ample, in fact it does not seem to require much of an exertion to fill buying orders.

Sugar stocks, while anything but active, show a good deal of strength.

Money is in good demand and rates show a hardening tendency. The Financier.

"Conduit par Minerve"

"The new year has brought you bonbons, I suppose."

Calypso, otherwise Edith Dacre, her black eyes half veiled by dark lashes, lazily watched the man as he examined the mail just deposited at his side by his house-boy.

"Depends on what you call bonbons," returned Ulysses, commonly called Jack Harris by those unfamiliar with the reincarnation theory. "I've got my walking papers."

He stood up, stretched the muscles of his back and expanded his chest.

"I don't know but what I'm glad of it," he said, "this life is enervating, Edith, say what you will of its tropical delights."

The woman also rose, and laid a slim hand on his coat-sleeve, with a caressing gesture.

"You don't mean it, Jack," she said, "you can't go back to that—" a sweeping gesture eastward over the expanse of blue water finished the sentence.

He did not answer, but appeared to be musing.

"Oh," she exclaimed, drawing her long, lithe figure to its full, imposing height, "it's a good resolution, I see."

There was a ghost of a sneer in her next words:

"One makes good resolutions on New Year's day."

He was still chewing the cud of some thought she failed to fathom, and did not appear to be listening.

"Well, then," she said, moving down the garden path a few steps, "it's a go, then. Good-bye, Mr. Harris. I thought you were going to the club to play tennis with me."

He roused himself from his reverie in time to catch the meaning of her last sentence.

"Oh, yes, I'm coming. But don't go yet, Edith. I—I want to talk to you about it." There was a boyish ring to his voice, a new tang from the old, tired, blase tone. "I'm glad, Edith, that somebody else has my berth. Why, just fancy, it's four years—four whole years—since I saw them all."

"'Them all'?" she repeated, "I suppose you mean your club friends—those jolly chaps you occasionally tell me about when you get the heimweh feeling."

"No, no," he answered impatiently, "I wasn't thinking of them just then. It was my wife, you know, and the boy. See here."

He seated himself beside her and poked about among the mass of letters he had just cast aside.

"This is from her, Edith. You don't care to read it? Well, perhaps it wouldn't be just the right thing for me to show it to you, anyhow. But see—she says the boy—he was eleven when I left home—is half way through the high school. He'll be in the university next. Fancy the little chap going into the university." He eagerly scanned other items in the long letter.

"This is my son, mine own Telemachus!"

The man looked up with a start. There was a reproachful look in the blue eyes bent upon Edith Dacre's black ones. But she neither blushed nor blenched.

"It amuses me, Jack," she smiled, "to think that in the four years I've known you I've never heard you give way to such transports before. We all knew you had a wife—yes, and a son—somewhere, but you never seemed greatly concerned about being absent from them, so we didn't take it to heart, either. How could you expect it?"

"You don't understand, Edith," he replied, impetuously, "I had to come here, you know. I just had to and I came."

"Other American consuls have been here, and brought their wives and families along. You didn't."

"I know, Edith. But you see I was tired of it all—I hated that flat, dull round of domestic life, and when this post was offered I jumped at it. I wanted to cut loose from everything—to breathe free air and meet people who had no connection with the old existence. Ella didn't care. She said it would do me good, and she wouldn't have wished to come, anyway, on account of the boy's education."

"Is she pretty?"

The question was irrelevant but Harris caught its import.

"No, not very. She's small and her figure is rather meagre, perhaps, and she isn't in robust health."

"Not a bit my style, eh?"

"Oh, no, not at all. She's just a nice little home body, the kind of woman that makes a man feel sorry enough when he doesn't always vote the straight domestic ticket, you know."

Mrs. Dacre rose and shook out her filmy muslin skirt.

"There's no room for tennis today, Mr. Harris," she said, "if you feel like that."

"Don't go, Edith—why, of course I'm going to play tennis, or any old game you say."

He called the boy to take his letters in, and prepared to accompany his fair visitor.

"I'm half sorry," he said, as they strolled down the path, "that I'm going, after all. Why, Edith, I'll have to leave you—God knows what this beastly little island would have been without your presence. You've been a good friend to me, Edith."

Friend! That was what he called it, then. Her mind ran back over four years of what he called friendship, in which were episodes which, though they counted as bagatelles in this non-censorious oriental section, would have led to the divorce court in civilized countries, had her husband been anything else than what he was. Captain Dacre never looked up from his poker games except at meal times.

At the thought of his departure, her nerve and her pride failed her at the same time.

"You mustn't go, Jack," she said—and burst into wild, bitter tears.

She sank down upon the seat by the garden-gate. It was in full sight of possible passers-by, but she did not care.

He knelt down and put his arms around her.

"Why, Edith," he said, "you don't really care, do you?"

Just for a moment he forgot the home yearnings. He remembered only his life on the island, the indolent existence punctuated by passionate episodes in which this woman always figured. How prosaic seemed life at the side of Ella, who knew nothing of the arts that had made the past four years to him a love poem in many and varied stanzas. His thought communicated itself to the woman at whose feet he knelt.

"She can't love you as I do," she murmured. "Are her kisses as sweet, as warm, as dear as mine?"

She pressed his hands in hers, and laid her cheek against his. There was nothing to break the silence but the waving of the trees in the light wind, and the lapping of the waves on the low beach.

A spell was over Ulysses. For an instant Calypso was in the ascendancy.

Then he saw an intent look pierce the languor of her glance. He followed her gaze.

Out on the horizon appeared the image of a ship, a huge transport slowly moving westward.

The spell was snapped. He rose from his knees, unclasped her clinging hands, and bade her rise.

"That means home," he said, "'twas well I made my resolution early."

"Bad resolutions are better broken than kept," she deprecated, putting out a detaining hand as he opened the gate.

"Good resolutions are sometimes looked after by Fate," he replied.

He looked again at the incoming transport. To him it meant home, country, fireside, family, friends, the club, the multitudinous objects that make the life of a man, not a puppet. The small world he had been living in for four years was already fading from memory. In that world was Edith Dacre.

* * * * * * * *

She waited and watched, thinking he would tire of the old life as he had wearied of the new. She said to herself that he would come back to her.

But he never did.

The Stage

A Chapter of Autobiography

It would be terribly conventional, wouldn't it, to say coming back to San Francisco is like coming home? But you can accuse me of tactfully saying the right thing, if you like, and I can't prove it to be sincere. You see, I appeared here very early in my career, and made my first success here, and that, I suppose, is why I always feel at home acting here. I look back at that little success in "The Dancing Girl" more as San Francisco's fault than my own. It was about ten years ago, and I had been on the stage only a little time. But I had crowded heaps of work and study into that time, although for a season I understudied all the female roles in three New York theatres at the same time. Nowadays when I play only one role, or possibly two, I don't get nearly as much experience. But when I came out here to the Baldwin theatre it was really my start. People called my performance of the lame girl in "The Dancing Girl" a hit, and to make a success in that splendid company that Mr. Palmer brought to the Baldwin meant something. My! just think,—there was Julia Arthur as the Dancing Girl and J. H. Stoddart as her father, and how excellent they both were! And then, Wilton Lackaye played the Duke. Mrs. D. P. Bowers was in the company, too, and May Brookyn, E. M. Holland, Edward Bell and Jennie Eustace. Think of it! Among actors like that San Francisco welcomed me, a beginner and a stranger, as a success. I tell you, that just fixed San Francisco for me. I suppose when an actor is asked to tell something about her stage career she should begin with her reason for going on the stage, unless she is able to go a little farther back and tell how she went "from a convent to the stage"; that beginning for an actor's autobiography is as conventional as the "Once upon a time" start of fairy tales, but it's the only true way of telling my beginning. And the second question is, "Why did you go on the stage?" I think to that my answer is, "Because I loved it." I do love it when I can play serious parts—I mean in their fidelity to nature and in their purpose, not necessarily lugubrious. For instance, "Jinny" Austin, in "The Girl with the Green Eyes," in which I appear next Monday at the Columbia, is superficially light and laughable, but what could be more serious, more tragic in theme, than her curse of jealousy which makes her hurt the man she loves better than any one in the world? I'm glad I am going to have an opportunity to play this part here, because some of the roles I have had to play in San Francisco haven't given me much chance to justify the predictions people were nice enough to make when I started in those "Dancing Girl" days. Musette in "Bohemia" I played here, not of course in Puccini's "Boheme," though we did do our singing in our own little way. No, it was Clyde Fitch's version; "The Girl with the Green Eyes" is Clyde Fitch's, too, you know. It was in Chas. Frohman's Empire stock company I played Musette, and an excellent company it was, with William Faversham, Henry Miller, Viola Allen, May Robson, and—oh, lots of other good artists. Ethel Barrymore was to have had the next part I came here in. That was as the stenographer in "The Tyranny of Tears," with John Drew. Mr. Frohman had cabled for Miss Barrymore to come to New York from London to play the role and while she was on the high seas he changed his mind and gave it to me. Why? Oh, we never ask why with Mr. Frohman. We simply do as he dictates, and somehow in the long run it turns out to have been just the right thing, even though we didn't quite see it in that way at the time. I don't mean that I could see getting the role of Miss Woodward as anything but just right. I loved it. Indeed, until this part in "The Girl with the Green Eyes" I haven't had so good a chance as that in San Francisco. When I came the second time with Mr. Drew I didn't have to share "female honors," as they say, with Isabel Irving, but the characters in "The Second in Command" weren't nearly so sympathetic, that is, sympathetic to me; I imagine the goody-goody heroine of that play was regarded as much more sympathetic by the average auditor than the self-opinionated, rather cynical stenographer. But perhaps that comes from my streak of Ibsen-ism. You know, I admire the old Norwegian tremendously, and you may be sure I shan't miss seeing Miss Gallatin in "Ghosts," which I see is to be done at the Columbia on a Sunday night. It was the last time I was here, when I was being nightly rescued from the numerous perils of underground vaults and things by William Gillette in "Sherlock Holmes," that some one asked my true ambition, which was to play in Shakespeare. Well, I've satisfied that ambition since—oh, no, not satisfied it, but at least fed it a bit. Mr. Frohman postponed sending me out, you know, to "lend" me to Klaw & Erlanger for their beautiful production of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" which opened at the New Amsterdam theatre a few months ago. Nat Goodwin was the Nick Bottom. But despite the beauty of the production and the excellence of the cast, the public didn't seem to want it and—well, here I am to play the green-eyed girl in Mr. Fitch's very modern drama.

The Peculiar Comedian, as Simon Ray, in the pastoral play, "The Minister's Son," which opens at the Grand Opera House tomorrow (Sunday) matinee.

Realism in Stage Mechanism

The electrician, stage carpenter, scene painter and assistants must have worked hard to bring "Blue Jeans" to the point of perfection in which it appears at the Alcazar. Nothing could be more realistic than the saw-mill scene, with the big saw making the sawdust fly like spray as it eats its way toward the hero bound to the moving carriage. Then there are pigeons that flutter about, a pet bull calf is introduced, shoes are cobbled, a barn is decorated, lamps filled, potatoes pared and other details brought in that are features of ordinary life, but became parts of a most artistic picture when in a play. "Blue Jeans" is full of these things, quaint country scenes with a village brass band, a barbecue, kazoo players, singing mill hands, agile dancers and a realistic Christmas eve celebration. The super-cultured hold up their hands in affected horror at those who confess to enjoy this sort of a melodrama, but there is really nothing that gives a more satisfactory evening's enjoyment. There's no problem to work out in "Blue Jeans." You see the villain working his sweet will until kind fate intervenes to stop him; the hero triumphing over difficulties, and the heroine doing her sweet, tender part. When the final curtain falls everything has been peacefully adjusted, and your queries are all answered. Many star casts have produced the Arthur drama, but none better than the present one. Mr. Durkin is quietly effective in the role of Perry. Mr. Hilliard does something quite out of the line of roles in which he has heretofore appeared as Ike. The others fill the characters allotted to them with the skill and intelligence only to be found in a well-conducted stock company. It is Miss Starr, however, who wins the audience's heart. As Perry's wife, June, she is the bright particular star of the play.

The firemen's melodrama is the most thrilling that has been seen at the Grand for many a day. It is instructive, too, and a splendid object lesson of what our brave fire laddies accomplish in the way of saving lives and property. A strong cast interprets the play, and many clever specialties are introduced. The theatre has been packed every night.

"Alphonse and Gaston" is the Opper pictures brought to life. The Central's audiences appreciate the fun of the dialogue and situations and they are treated also to a fine lot of specialties, by Miss Ainsworth, who is a charming singer, Myrtle Vane, Lillian Levy and others. Millar Bacon as Alphonse is one of the big hits of the production.

The New Tivoli

The opening of the new Tivoli took place too late for discussion in this week's issue. From all that I have been able to learn concerning the plans of the management, the new temple of music is destined to have even a more brilliant career than the old one. It is unquestionably the most superbly equipped theatre in the West, and is especially adapted for the production of operas and musical extravaganzas. At this writing I am confident that the verdict of the first night's audience will be one of enthusiastic approval. However, the opening attraction, a spectacular musical extravaganza, will convey but a vague hint of what the management has in store for its patrons. It is to be followed by musical comedies and comic operas never before produced in this city, and I hear that Ferris Hartman is to spring some surprises in stage pictures and stage business, of which he made a special study while abroad. During his trip he picked up many new wrinkles which will prove of great advantage to the new Tivoli.

The Overworked Librettist

I have been protesting against Harry B. Smith, the librettist, for a long time. I have been advising him to lay off for awhile, and permit other people to do the libretto hack work for the musical comedy theatres of New York and the rest of the country, until a few new ideas filtered into his brain. But he is so far away that he probably never heard either my protests or appeals. Now, however, the critic of the New York Sun is after him, and he will probably hearken. The latest specimen of his clumsiwork, "The Girl from Dixie," was presented on Broadway the other night, and the Sun critic said that "in his efforts to write all the plays for all the actors Mr. Smith has overreached himself"; that he should "call a halt in his Libretto factory and put both his hands on half pay." He pronounced the piece the worst ever. And yet in doing his worst Mr. Smith must have been trying to do his best, for the piece was written for the girl of his heart, Miss Irene Bentley. She is Mr. Smith's protege, as everybody on Broadway knows, and he has undertaken to make a star out of her. We in the far West wonder where all the stars come from, and why many of them were ever elevated above the dead level of the horizon. Most of them are children of love, and they demonstrate that talent is unnecessary when money is available to boom mediocrity and secure for it a glittering setting. The Sun man does not give the secret away; there is a strong bond of sympathy between the theatres and the newspapers of New York. However he does say that Miss Bentley "used to be a very charming little actress with a sweet but tiny voice and a limited amount of grace"; that she is now "out of focus and that she needs severe stage management to bring her back into the picture." This same clever critic said of Miss Nesbitt in the same piece, "Her eyes were fixed so incessantly on an old gentleman in a right hand stage box that she hadn't even time to follow the leader. The last time we heard her she was about to take the veil. She must have changed her mind since, for last night she acted as if she would very much rather take a tiara."

Triumphant Californians

Our old friend, Edwin Stevens, who flits periodically across the Tivoli stage just to keep his bank account from sagging in off seasons, is back on Broadway, where he has scored the hit of his life in Dave Belasco's new success, "Sweet Kitty Bellairs." Henrietta Crosman is the star of the play, but Stevens runs her a close second. He is playing the part of an autocratic inebriate, and in discussing his performance Acton Davies of the Sun said: "His scene of intoxication was so admirably executed that we tremble to think how much Scotch whisky he must have consumed in arriving at such a state of alcoholic perfection, and yet his drunkenness was so dignified and stately that it would not have shocked even a member of the W. C. T. U.." California, by the way, has reason to be proud of Dave Belasco, for he is today the greatest playwright and manager in the United States, if not in the world. I know of no other playbuilder who has sustained a record for unbroken success equal to that of Belasco. The critics agree that Sweet Kitty Bellairs will take her place in the great gallery of feminine stage pictures, which already includes Maryland, Zaza, Du Barry and Yo San. It is interesting to note that Belasco has shown good judgment in exploiting California talent. Blanche Bates is his star in "The Darling of the Gods," which play is under the stage management of George L\sk. Dave Warfield is his star in "The Auctioneer," and now Edwin Stevens comes out strong in the latest Broadway success. All of Belasco's theatrical enterprises are making money, but all the other managers are complaining of poor business.

THE ORIGINAL "BLUE JEANS" PLAYERS.

This is a reproduction of a very old and valuable photograph—the only one in existence—loaned to the Alcazar by Joseph Arthur, the author of "Blue Jeans," and shows a group of well known players in the original cast. It was taken by Sarony, in New York, thirteen years ago. From right to left the people are Geo. D. Chaplin, Robert Hilliard, George Fawcett, the late John J. Wallace—of the old California stock in 1885—and Judith Berolde, while seated in front is Jennie Yeamans.

Tyndall Departs for Los Angeles

Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall interested a large audience at Steinway hall last Sunday night, with a demonstration of the marvels of thought force and what may be called "The Dynamics of Will." He explained the principle by which the feats of strength exhibited by "The Georgia Magnet" may be accomplished on a purely scientific basis, without any element of either confederacy or supernaturalism. He reproduced the phenomena under the supervision of a committee, and explained the feats of what seem to be abnormal strength and will, on the hypothesis of the law of the parallelogram of forces. He stated that the manifestations are none the less marvelous for the fact of their being a manifestation of a perfectly natural law. His lectures and experiments have demonstrated that psychic phenomena and psychic powers are normal and governed by natural laws; that these powers he possesses are capable of practical use, and that all mystery is capable of solution on a logical basis. By the way, Tyndall has accepted the presidency of an Institute in Los Angeles teaching and practising the practical use of psychology, and will leave for the South shortly.

A correspondent writes me from New York that, far from being a frost on Broadway, "Babette" is nightly crowding the theatre where it is the attraction. It is soon going on the road, so the fascinating Fritzi Scheff may come again to San Francisco some time next year. This is a city where she is a sure-enough favorite.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The Orpheum Road Show, which has taken the town by storm, will be augmented for the farewell performances by Victor Moore and Emma Littlefield who will present their amusing skit "Change Your Act," or "Back to the Woods." The two performers impersonate Western variety-show people who have just arrived in New York with the intention of "breaking into" high-class vaudeville. The stage in a vaudeville theatre as it appears during a morning rehearsal is shown. Several stage hands pass back and forth arranging and rearranging the various pieces of scenery and in the midst of all the confusion the two new aspirants for histrionic honors perform their "stunts" for the manager of the house. Elizabeth Murray, "Caesar," the mind reading poodle, Ed. F. Reynard, the Melani Trio, Eckhoff and Gordon, Albertus and Millar, and the Nightons will complete the program.

The beautiful Christmas spectacle which is pleasing thousands of visitors every afternoon and evening at the Chutes will be continued for another week and every child in attendance in the afternoons, up to and including Friday, New Year's Day, will be given a present from the electrically illuminated Christmas tree at the conclusion of the act. Others on the program will be Charles Gardner and Marie Stoddard, novelty musical sketch artists, Joe and Sadie Britton, colored singing and dancing couple, Esmeralda, xylophone and bell soloist, and Mabel Lamson, the popular contralto.

We are not to have Clara Bloodgood in the Columbia production of "The Girl With the Green Eyes," but the cast will be a notable one even without the New York ex-society woman. Ida Conquest, who is a great favorite here and whom we last saw in "Sherlock Holmes," will play the title role. Robert Drouet, who has been here with Effie Ellsler and with Mary Mannering, will be the leading man, and others in the company will be Mrs. Thomas Whiffen, Grace Henderson, William Tooker and Edith Talliaferro. It is a Fitch play and a Frohman production. Mrs. Langtry in "Mrs. Deering's Divorce" comes next and then Alberta Gallatin in Ibsen's "Ghosts."

The attraction beginning tomorrow matinee at the Grand will be "the peculiar comedian," W. B. Patton, and a strong supporting company in "The Minister's Son," a sweet, wholesome story of life in a Down East village. Mr. Patton is today considered one of the most promising young stars on the American stage. In style, method, mannerism and speech, he is a strong reminder of the late Sol Smith Russell. The play will be most elaborately mounted and no effort will be spared to make it in every way worthy of popular approval. January third, Jo Kelly and company will appear in the musical cut-up, "The Head Waitress."

"Blue Jeans" will easily crowd the Alcazar another week and then will come "A Lady of Quality."

"I. O. U." will enter upon its fifth week at Fischer's. Helen Russell, a statuesque beauty, and John Peachy, an Eastern baritone, will join the Fischer forces in the musical comedy composed by one of San Francisco's newspaper men, that is to succeed "I. O. U." Charles Candee, the new musical director who comes next week, was with Klaw and Erlanger's big New York productions in a similar capacity for several years.

The Central's special week's engagement of the famous rural comedy, "The Dairy Farm," begins next Monday evening. This play is a household word in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and other cities, where it rolled up a record of over twelve hundred performances, including all summer runs in Chicago and Atlantic City. It is of the wholesome, human-nature type that appeals to all sorts of theatre-goers and offends no one. In the cast will be several character players who appeared in all the Eastern city runs: Theo. T. Rook, as Simon Krum, the seventy year old miser and slave trader; Tony West, as Joel Whitbeck, the lanky, loquacious country peddler; Helen Hartley, as the rich village girl, Eunice Jane Perkins; and Sarah Ward as Miss Newkirk, the kind-hearted housekeeper. The young lovers will be impersonated by Herschel Mayall and Eugenia Thais Lawton, while the favorite comedienne, Myrtle Vane, will be "Minty" the village tom-boy.

There will be New Year's matinees at all the theatres.

Revery of a Bachelor

(His Answer to Her Letters—in soliloquy.)

Lord—here's another. I wonder why that silly goose keeps on writing to me?

Silence means consent or contempt. In this case: Which? I haven't read the last half-dozen yet. There they lie, stacked up on the dresser, covered with dust. I haven't time to open them, much less read them. Women are all kinds of fools, if they only knew. She appears to be in the bunch with the rest. Wonder if she's crying her eyes out because I don't write? I can't be bothered—and if I write that means more replies from her, to swell the pack of missives on the dresser. Broken heart? More likely, hurt vanity. Who would have thought a little flirtation, so unconventionally begun, would have such epistolary consequence?

I can't help it if women will fall in love with me. If I happen to have that masterful manner that takes with them, it's not my fault. Of course, I'm not saying that I did not help it along a little. It is so natural when with the weaker sex to assume a tenderness if you have it not—and a mixture of brute seems to make even worse havoc with their—well, call it emotions.

After all, what can she expect? I can't be wasting my time—yes, and money, though that is only a minor consideration—on a girl who won't go the whole gamut. Does she think men are made of stone? She's cold as Greenland—well, perhaps she isn't all ice, but those blooming principles of hers are just as bad. Now, there's Rosie, and Gertie, and Birdie—they aren't hampered by any such nonsense. And when a man is tied down to work for so many days of the year as I am, when he does quit the grind for a few days he must have FUN to the limit.

I wonder what she'd say if she knew about those six missives piled up there, and this one in my hand—all unread? She hasn't much to remember me by, not even a tintype. That reminds me—what the deuce did I do with her picture? I left it somewhere—why, it must have been that the dog was worrying last night. I took the fragments to light my pipe with. Hard to catch the flame, too—reckon the picture's temperament matched its subject's.

Guess I'd better burn the letters, too. Supposing I died—a violent death—and the reporters got hold of those things. Mighty brave reading it would be for her friends, and my family. The papers might say that my death had the usual woman at the bottom of it.

She'd be flattered, of course. Women always are. Lord!—why the devil do they always take things au serieux?

No, I'll burn them now. Here they go! And to think that out of the whole seven I hadn't read one!

—The Mind-Reader.

Judge Colt of the Circuit Court of the United States District of Massachusetts deserves the congratulations and thanks of the American people for the broad and sweeping decision rendered Nov. 9, 1903, restraining Adams, Taylor Co. of Boston, Mass, from using the word "Club" in connection with bottled Cocktails. The complainants, G. F. Heublein & Bro., have spent much time and money in introducing the celebrated Club Cocktails, which like all well known and staple articles have been more or less imitated. This decision means not only protection to the maker of of the goods, but affords equal protection to the purchaser, and simplifies the matter of getting what you want and pay for. We trust the Courts will continue in this good work and protect known and established brands from the piracy to which they have so long been subject.

The tenth anniversary and souvenir ball of Professor George R. Puckett's Academy of Dancing will take place next Wednesday evening, December thirtieth, in Mission Opera Hall, Mission street between Seventeenth and Eighteenth. On this occasion handsome souvenirs will be given and Professor Puckett hopes to greet many of his former pupils and their friends, as well as those attending his present classes, on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, in Mission Opera Hall. The Puckett Academy is so popular that it was found necessary to add one night a week to the classes, with a social on Wednesday for graduated pupils and their friends.

MUSIC

The Adelstein Pupil Musicale

The usual immense audience that attends invitational affairs packed the hall and overflowed into the aisles last Thursday evening, when Samuel Adelstein's pupils gave their musicale. The program presented was especially interesting as showing what can be done on the mandolin and lute, many new things for the plectrum instruments being rendered. Some of them had never been given before in this country. The average auditor, accustomed to hearing only ragtime and popular tunes on the mandolin, was surprised to note the fine renditions of classic selections on this occasion. The Mandolin Orchestra, under Mr. Adelstein's direction, opened the program with Mezzacapo's "Ideal" waltz and the same composer's arrangement of Schubert's "Serenade," later giving a "Rigoletto" fantasie by Pietrapertosa, Almagro-Balsimelli's "Canto d'Amor," Mazzacapo's "Napoli" tarantella, and Pietrapertosa's arrangement of "William Tell." The orchestra consists of: Mandolins, Anita Ferguson, Florence Kentfield, Florence Magnin, Emma Noonan, Florence Marvin, Alice Swanson and Glen Cowgill; Italian lutes, Mrs. H. H. Sherwood, Elvira W. Hobbs; with Mollie Pratt at the piano. They rendered all their selections with admirable tempo and nicety of expression. The Adelstein Plectrum Quartet—Florence Magnin and Mr. Adelstein, mandolins, Mrs. Sherwood and Miss Hobbs, lutes—gave Calace's "Quartetto a Penno," three movements (first time in America), the berceuse from Godard's "Jocelyn" and Durand's ""Pomponette" (arranged for the quartet by Signor Munier of Florence, Italy), their rendition being intelligent and harmonious. Another interesting number was the trio for three Italian lutes, by Bellenghi, a serenade, "Sul Lido," by Mrs. Sherwood, Miss Hobbs and Mr. Adelstein. The Adelstein pupils were assisted by Miss Elena Roeckel, contralto, Edward M. Thornton, tenor, and H. Warner Sherwood, the boy soprano. Miss Roeckel's numbers were Massenet's long and difficult "Pensee d' Automne," which she sang with full regard for its many fine points of expression; Hahn's "Si Mes Vers Avaient, des Ailes" and Allitsen's charming "Love is a Bubble." Mr. Thornton, who is a scholarly and pleasing tenor, gave songs by De Koven, Bartlett, Rogers and Meyer-Helmund. Master Sherwood's numbers were D'Hardelot's "Dance of the Dragon Flies" and Woodman's "An Open Secret." His voice has been splendidly cultivated and he takes his high notes, so like those of a prima donna, with rare ease.

The little pupils of Mrs. Leila France McDermott gave a musicale last Saturday, when scenes from some of the grand operas were given. The program was: Duet, Don Giovanni, Louise Crim, Mrs. McDermott; Il Trovatore, Lettie Belt; Mermaid's song (Oberon), Marian, Mosebach; march, Lucia di Lammermoor, Ada Belton; Daughter of the Regiment, Hazel King; Bohemian Girl, Gladyce Hartley; Dear Little Buttercup (Pinafore), Louis McDermott; waltz from La Traviata, Frank Belt; William Tell, Lillie Mosebach; Martha, Irene McDermott; Lucrezia Borgia, Louise Crim; waltz song from Faust, Elizabeth McDermott; march from Norma, Mary P. Belt; "I dreamt I dwelt in marble halls" (Bohemian Girl), Hennig Berg; march from Der Freischutz, Harry Boshardt; air from Magic Flute, Mozart, Blanche Brooks, Mrs. McDermott. The selections were all rendered with spirit and considerable understanding.

One of the musical events of the dying season was the closing program of 1903 given by the San Francisco Musical Club in Lyric hall, last week. The program was in charge of Miss Ella V. McCloskey, and Mozart's "Requiem Mass" was presented under the direction of Dr. H. J. Stewart.

The Christmas musical program at the First Congregational church, Oakland, was given last Sunday evening by the chorus choir of sixty voices, under the direction of Alexander Stewart, with the following soloists: Mrs. Grace Northrup Davis, soprano, Mrs. Carroll-Nicholson, contralto, Arthur A. Macurda, tenor, Willard T. Young, baritone; William E. King, organist. A notable feature of the program was that four of the anthems sung were by leading American composers, Arthur Foote, Geo. W. Chadwick, Homer H. Bartlett and Dr. H. J. Stewart. Those by the three first named composers are but recently published.

Mrs. Alvina Heuer Willson, the soprano, who has been for some time at Boise, Idaho, will spend the winter in San Francisco with her mother, Mrs. Philip Heuer, at 2117 Taylor street.

The Loring Club Concert

The second of this season's Loring Club concerts hardly achieved the brilliant success of the first. The entire first part of the program was occupied by "Roland's Horn," a setting of the old legend by Markull, a modern German composer. The greater part of the work is for male chorus with a few short tenor and baritone solos interspersed, and an occasional horn interlude where the text demands it. The work is long, the words taking up nearly five pages of the printed program, and vocally it taxed the club to the utmost. The singers deserve credit for coming through the many changing rhythms and modulations without a break, though one had an uneasy feeling all the time that such a catastrophe was likely to happen. That it did not, argues faithful and steady work on the part of the chorus. The solo parts were entrusted to Mr. Macurda and Dr. Schalkhammer, two singers who can be always depended upon. The most really beautiful part of the "Roland's Horn" music was the piano accompaniment, performed by Miss Ruth Loring in her usual masterly manner. The horn soloist was too timid to make his part effective. Mrs. Grace Northrup Davis made her entrance in the second part of the program in the Joan d' Arc aria, "Adieu Forets" in which she made a very effective use of her clear though somewhat cold soprano. She did not come out so well in Adam's "Cantique de Noel." Last year the club made a brilliant success of this number, the soprano solo soaring out over the chorus and orchestra. This time, Mrs. Davis seemed to be a little off the key and kept her voice down so that at times it could hardly be heard. However the audience demanded an encore and the second strophe was repeated with much better effect, so far as the soloist was concerned. Later in the evening Mrs. Davis was wholly charming in "The Bell-Ringer's Daughter," a new composition by Rheinthaler for soprano solo and men's chorus. Two other new additions to the repertoire of the club were an excerpt from Max Bruch's opera "Die Loreley" and "The Sailor's Dream" by Franz Abt. The libretto of the first named work is one which Mendelssohn had accepted, but the musical part of the work was left uncompleted at his death. Max Bruch afterwards used the same libretto for his opera. The "Chorus of Vintagers and Boatmen" is spirited and swinging, and was well treated by the club. Mr. Brenner, the soloist, had a very grateful part of which he did not fail to make the most. I hope we shall hear this selection again. The Abt song was not so well done, and Mr. Medley was quite throaty in his solo. The concert ended with two movements from Mendelssohn's "Festgesang" with organ accompaniment. The club was at its best in this smooth and gracious music, which has all the solemn and healing effect of a benediction. Mr. David Loring conducted.

In an interview with Adelina Patti in New York, the charming diva said that she ascribed the reason that her voice has survived the ravages of time to the fact that she never worried. People who have followed Madame Patti's long and prosperous career do not remember that she was ever oppressed with any need of worrying. She began life with a voice which surpassed that of any other singer and she is still in possession of that voice. Her farewell tour has been marked by triumphant ovations in several of the large Eastern cities and her two appearances in this city next month are anxiously looked forward to.

To-morrow evening at the First Methodist Church Dudley Buck's Christmas cantata, "The Coming of the King," will be rendered by a chorus of fifty voices, directed by Percy A. R. Dow. The regular choir will be augmented by the First Baptist choir of Oakland, and will have the assistance of Miss Gertrude Hibberd (violin). The soloists will be: Mrs. W. L. Turney, Mrs. Margaret Best, Miss Corinne Gyle, Miss Grace Hipkins, Mrs. O. Mendenhall, Messrs. Kent, Burckhalter and J. W. Garthwaite; Miss Harriet Fish at the organ.

A concert will be given on January sixth at the Alhambra by pupils of Prof. E. S. Bonelli. A varied program, which will display the improvement made since the last recital, has been arranged for the occasion.

A very interesting "Evening" was given by the pupils of Miss Charlotte Pau, last Tuesday, in Century hall. It was an invitational affair and largely attended.

Miss Belle Claire Chamberlain, the pianist, left last week for Chicago, where she intends to reside permanently.

Automobile Topics

The past year has been a profitable one for San Francisco's automobile dealers, and nearly all the automobiles sold in central and northern California have been distributed from this city. All through California has the automobile become popular. The Easterners are about right when they say that automobiling is still in its infancy, for greater things may yet be expected of the modern chariot not only here, but in Los Angeles and every other city of any importance on the coast. Clubs are being formed in many cities and this is another proof of the growing popularity of the automobile. In San Francisco there are now double the number of machines owned at this time last year. This, with the erection of numerous large automobile houses, among which are some of the largest garages in the world, who can doubt but that the automobile interest has taken a great jump since 1892. Wonderful as is the machine of today, however, its possibilities are by no means exhausted.

A firm in the East is engaged in a work in the automobile line the outcome of which will be of importance to the far-off Death Valley of the borax region. The work being done is the building of an automobile train, engine and seven cars, designed to take the place and do the work of twelve hundred mules and two hundred and forty drivers, saving one hundred thousand dollars annually. For its use a macadam road one hundred miles long is now being built over the shifting sands through Rocky Pass and along the mountain sides in the borax valley. The engine will run at the head of the train or cars and by means of a coupling tongue the current generated will be transmitted to the cars, each of which will be driven by two motors of its own.

Owing to the success attending the automobile races at Denver, San Francisco and Los Angeles, a movement has been started for an automobile racing circuit next year. Big meetings are to be held in many of the large cities in the West at which all the racing champions will compete. The sport has passed the experimental stage this year and the local club is so well pleased with the recent meeting that it may give another one next spring. The Southern California Automobile Club has decided to have a race meet next spring. The date has not been set owing to the press of other business connected with the Plaza del Rey Road but the meeting will be a two day affair as was the last, and will be held about Decoration Day or perhaps a week or two earlier.

James Waters, the wealthy nursery man, has bought a "Northern" automobile, the type manufactured in Detroit. It is a single-seat runabout, a compact and neat little roadster of six-horse power, which can clip off miles at the rate of thirty per hour.

H. D. Morton, a director of the Pioneer Automobile Company, has just returned from a trip throughout the East, which included the inspection of the different factories represented by the Pioneer Company. He states that interest in the automobile throughout the East is greater than ever before. All factories manufacturing standard machines have been taxed to their limit and their entire output has been sold. Mr. Morton particularly investigated the automobile as applied to trucking and has decided that it is the future vehicle for freight transportation. He states further that the automobile show to be given in Madison Square, New York, in January, will probably surpass the annual show held in Paris. He says there is absolutely no garage in the East that will in any way compare with the Pioneer Company's new building, 901-925 Golden Gate avenue. Jesse E. Poundstone of Colusa county last week wired his order into the Pioneer Company for a Stevens-Duryea machine.

J. Parker Whitney has just returned from the East and has placed his order for a 1904 Winton touring car to be sent to his ranch at Rockland. Mr. Garland of Los Angeles has an order for a 1904 Winton. Mr. Garland had a 1903 machine which he bought about a month ago, and he was so well satisfied with it that he placed his order for a 1904 model without even seeing it. This makes the fourteenth order received by the Pioneer Automobile Company for 1904 Winton touring cars. As predicted by some of the automobile dealers in San Francisco, the standard touring cars are going to be very hard to get this season. Several sales of Winton touring cars have been made in Boston at premiums of from two hundred to three hundred dollars for early delivery on 1904 machines.

C. A. Hawkins, General Manager of the White Automobile Company, has returned from a trip over the southern part of California. He believes that the automobile business in that section is at present better than in any other part of the State. "The Automobile Club of California," said Mr. Hawkins, "is exceedingly active in behalf of good roads and there is a scheme on foot now to build a straightaway speedway ten miles in length on which all records may be broken."

F. Sabit of Paris, France, was a recent visitor in San Francisco and one day he happened to drop in at the White and chanced to see the new touring car painted in cream white. He ordered one just like it to be shipped to his home in Paris, asserting that he never saw a handsomer modern chariot.

E. C. Stone of Riverside, an ardent devotee of the motor car, will take his White touring car with him on his purposed Eastern trip.

Dr. Sill, an Oakland physician, has bought an Oldsmobile in which to pay his professional visits. Dennis Diamond of Alameda last week purchased an Oldsmobile. This is the second one he has purchased from the Pioneer Automobile Company.

Mr. M. L. Goss, General Sales Manager of the Baker Motor Vehicle Company of Cleveland, Ohio, is spending a few days in the city and making his headquarters at the Pioneer Automobile Company, agents for the Baker machine on this coast. Mr. Goss says that his company has done a very satisfactory business during the past year and that the use of electric vehicles is on the increase.

A sample of the new Jones-Corbin car has been shipped by express to the Pacific Motor Car Company, they having been awarded the agency of the Jones-Corbin Automobile Company's products. This machine weighs twelve hundred pounds, has twelve-horse power and standard gearing which enables it to attain a speed of forty miles an hour. A carload of these machines is following the sample by fast freight and the sample is probably now on exhibition at the Pacific Motor Car Company's office, 49 City Hall avenue. This company has also added to its line of cars the Crest Manufacturing Company's runabout. The engine is under the front hood and it is a high-powered little car, selling at six hundred and fifty dollars; also the Crest tonneau car of the same make, with forward motors, at eight hundred and fifty dollars. These will be on exhibition at the company's garage shortly. The new 1904 St. Louis tonneau cars are expected daily and the new four-cylinder model "L" Packard will arrive by express early in January.

A Souvenir Worth While

It is a fine collection of reproductions of works by representative Californian artists that is gathered within the portfolio published by the United Crafts and Arts of California (Incorporated). This is the first of what will be a very comprehensive series of such collections. There are ten half-tones of large size in the portfolio, and each is a gem. They are all good examples of the style of the artist, and the collection is of rare value. It seems almost incredible that it could have been gotten up in this admirable way and sold for one dollar, but that is its price. The subjects of the pictures, and their artists, are: Crow Indian Cowboy, H. W. Hansen; Old Mission Interior—San Juan, C. P. Neilson; California Redwoods, L. P. Latimer; From a Drawing, L. Maynard Dixon; Firelight Study, Maurice Del Mue; Indian Madonna, Xavier Martinez; Digger Indians, Henry Raschen; Chinatown Sketch, A. Methfessel; A Drawing, Gordon Ross; Sketch in Holland, C. Chapel Judson.

An Ideal Mineral Water

The merits of Geneva Lithia Mineral Water have been so completely proved by experience and observation that no other arguments are necessary to attest its worth. It has been commended by scientists for its purity and its perfect adaptability to the digestive system. Physicians particularly recommend it for use in dyspepsia, gastric and internal indigestion attended with nervous prostration, general debility and anæmia, catarrh of the bladder, eczema, incipient Bright's disease, chronic albuminuria, diabetes, rheumatism, neuralgia, torpid liver and other diseases of the liver and kidneys. Joe Jefferson, W. H. Crane and Lieutenant Cosby, U. S. N., are among those who attest to Geneva Lithia's merits. The Geneva Lithia Mineral Spring at Geneva, New York, was discovered in 1886, and is now one of the best known and most highly recommended mineral springs in the world. The well of this remarkable spring is eight hundred and thirty feet deep, the spring proper being three hundred and five feet deep, lying between a layer of Medina stone sixty feet thick and a deep strata of hard slate. Over three hundred and sixty-five thousand gallons daily are sent out to Europe and through the United States. It has lately been discovered that the Geneva water blends well with wine or whisky, and prevents the alcohol from fermenting in the stomach, or forming uric acid. It is well to remember that the genuine Geneva Lithia is always put up in stone or glass packages. The general offices of the company are at 20 Court street, Brooklyn, New York, the Western offices at 50 West Eagle street, Buffalo. San Francisco office, S. E. corner Market and Fifth streets. "The Edge of Things"

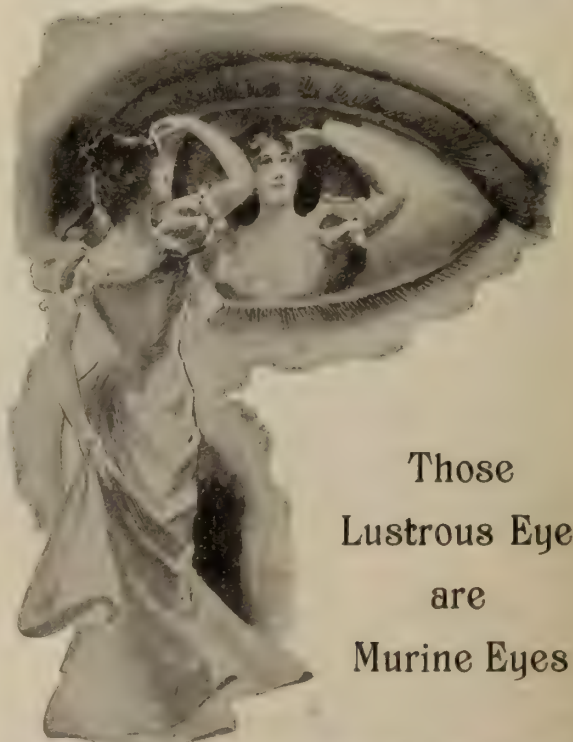
No one who has lived on a sheep ranch long enough for the first novelty to have worn off can fail to appreciate the truth of "The Edge of Things." Two of the chapters incorporated in the book were published independently a few years ago in one of the magazines and attracted universal attention. We have all read newspaper accounts of herders being attacked by melancholia or mania, but no half-dozen lines, or even half-column account, can give any idea of the dreary monotony of life where there is "nothing but time and sheep," and where there are no books or papers or human companionship except that of other herders, for the sheepman who is not a capitalist must work with his men and as hard as any of them, and often owes it to that blessed necessity that he maintains his faculties. To the city dweller a sheep is a beautiful, soft, white, gentle creature living on a green lawn and coming up to be petted and fed tid-bits by hand. There is a white-painted farm house with green blinds and porches, and numerous outbuildings, and a garden, to say nothing of a family of women and children, all within a few minutes of a town. In reality there is a surging mass of the woolly idiots, dirty and dusty, and perhaps more or less afflicted with disease, who eat the ground bare and trample it into dust a foot thick, all the time keeping up a monotonous bawling which is utterly meaningless. The ranch house is often an adobe hut, often a mere brush shed, and often not even that, but the herder wraps himself in his blanket and lies down under the stars, with his dog beside him and the sheep about. The postoffice and the telegraph station are a day's journey away, if not more, and the mail service, not oftener than once a week, is supplemented by the efforts of others in like circumstances, who undertake to forward what letters and papers there are as soon as convenient. It was into such a pastoral life that Dilling Brown entered immediately after his graduation from an eastern college. He invested his patrimony in Cotswolds and then started with his flocks for the region of "free grass" across the Sierras, full of enthusiasm and pluck which would have insured his success if enthusiasm, pluck and hard work were not offset by conditions which neither he nor any one else could control. To a man fresh from the centre of education and accustomed to communication with his kind the new life could not fail to bring disenchantment, and it is only through force of will that he succeeds in escaping the fate of his predecessor. In the adobe, evidently hastily abandoned, he finds a girl's work basket and a few other insignificant trifles, and he makes their owner his confidant though he never expects to see her, and it is only by accident that he discovers her name. That is one man's story, but the manager of the next ranch, Louis Papin of the Esmeralda, in spite of his fifty assistants, is hardly less lonely. Large as his force of herders is, they are on the verge of collapse from sheer monotony of existence, and might have fallen upon each other with homicidal intent or deserted bodily, or done anything desperate when a timely raid of Mexican thieves brought action and variety. As I said before, those who have lived on a sheep ranch may fancy themselves there again. Those who have no such experience to guide them may at least learn to regard with charity the conduct of the herders who, after months of the range, find themselves once more amongst fellow-men instead of bawling quadrupeds. "The Edge of Things" is by Elia W. Peattie, and published by the Fleming Revell Co.

A Deal in Wheat



The short stories collected under the title of "A Deal in Wheat" will not add anything to the reputation of Frank Norris as a writer, for he was not at his best in the short story, and it is not unlikely that, had he lived, he would have been content to let these lie buried in the pages of the periodicals in which they appeared. As compared with his novels, they give the impression of marginal notes, trials of his pen, but so far from blaming his literary executors for having gathered up these fragments, as one so often has occasion to do when an author has passed from the control of his work, we would gladly welcome a collection of those earlier stories which appeared in The Wave. "A Deal in Wheat," the story which gives name to this volume, contains the germ which was afterward expanded into "The Pit." "The Passing of Cockeye Blacklock" is noticeable as having been suggested by a newspaper paragraph which furnished plots for three writers, and, by a curious coincidence, all three stories appeared almost simultaneously. "The Ghost in the Crosstrees" is considered by some to be the best short story Norris wrote; "The Ship That Saw a Ghost" tells of a treasure-seeking expedition and the obstacles the seekers encountered. Perhaps the strongest of the ten tales is "A Memorandum of Sudden Death." Granted that a diary

MURINE EYE REMEDY

Those Lustrous Eyes are Murine Eyes

California sunlight, strong winds and alkali dust cause eye trouble. Little troubles grow, don't neglect them. Murine is a favorite toilet requisite, restores a faded eye to natural brilliancy, promotes growth of eyelashes, cures granulation and redness of lids, doesn't smart, soothes eye pain.
The laboratories of the Murine Eye Remedy Co., Chicago, are the largest in the world producing an exclusive line of eye remedies. Trade supplied by all jobbers. SOLD BY DRUGGISTS AND OPTICIANS could be written under such conditions, the rest is real and convincing enough. Three troopers, under guidance of a scout, are surrounded by Indians on the plain, and Karslake, one of the men, and the last survivor of the four, jots down the incidents of their journey while unmolested and describes their last stand. Admirers of this lamented author will be glad to place "A Deal in Wheat" on their library shelves. Published by Doubleday, Page & Co.

The Golden Chain

I believe it was Dr. Johnson who said that the most useful books are those small enough to be held in the hand by the fireside. Judged by this definition, the Macmillan "Little Novels" assuredly have won their place. The latest addition to this series is "The Golden Chain," by Gwendolen Overton, and it is a little gem. There are just one hundred of the small pages, but there is not a word that one would care to see added or subtracted. The scene is laid in the southwest, the region which the author knows so intimately, and the characters are few and the action swift. It is a love story, but not of the stereotyped pattern, and some of the characters are new to the environment. Dudley Keble, son of an ex-New England school teacher and a woman of the West, just twenty-two, unsophisticated in the ways of the larger world and unspoiled by the frontier dissipations, which do not appeal to him in spite of his cowboy experiences, is scarcely less innocent than Felicia Evans, the seventeen-year-old child, who travels from place to place with her aunt and uncle, strolling actors who essay Shakespeare and border melodrama at the army outposts, the cow camps or the straggling Mexican villages, wherever a few dollars can be picked up. Felicia is a lily growing in the mud and slime. It is Dudley's first meeting with the actor genus and his first awakening to the charms of the other sex. In one of the little towns, less than a day's journey from the Keble ranch, is a statue of the Virgin round whose neck is hung a votive offering of a heavy golden chain. While the traveling thespians are in the town this chain is stolen, and suspicion points to Felicia as the thief. The mob spirit is aroused in the townspeople, who resent the sacrilege, and young Keble shows himself to be a man of both thought and action. Miss Overton has shown a deep insight into human motives in her treatment of Josefita Acros, the Mexican girl, whose townsmen look upon her as one of the sanctified. Just what she has to do with Keble or the actors or the missing treasure the author has told in her own way. There are some wonderfully effective bits of description in this little book, the truth of which must be apparent to any one who has ever passed a brief time in one of these Mexican villages where the native customs are scarcely touched, much less modified by those of the Gringoes. One almost feels the heat of the Death Valley, and the long, dry ride across it. As a bit of book-making this little volume deserves a word by itself. There are two finely executed illustrations, besides initials and ornamental chapter headings and decorative end papers. The cover design shows the golden chain which gives the story its title, wound about the characteristic cactus of the southwest.

Clever Playlets

Amateur actors who are on the lookout for "something to play" and at the same time do not wish to tackle the difficulties of scene changing and stage management will find the long desired in Grace Luce Irwin's little book, "Drawing Room Plays." For the most part, these little farces are practical and humorous without being too ambitious, and they ought easily to be within the capacity of the average drawing room actor. Anybody who has ever played with amateurs will remember that they all want to be stars, and also that while female stars are numerous enough, those of the male persuasion, with time and talent to master their parts, are apt to be somewhat rarer. Mrs. Irwin has been clever enough to make the various parts in her little dramas of nearly equal importance; also, to lay them out for a predominating number of women players. The book contains seven plays, adapted to casts of from two to six, each preceded by a brief note giving instructions for acting, costumes and staging. While for the most part light and humorous in conception, two of the number, "An Innocent Villain" and "The Wedding of Mah Foy," offer good opportunities for character acting. The book is attractive in its handsome red binding, with poster label and red edges. The rubricated designs of the play headings are by A. F. Willmarth. Published by Paul Elder and Company. These publishers have a knack of harmonizing the binding with the contents of a book, and the present work is one of their cleverest effects in this line.

The Year

And when our children turn the page,
To ask what triumphs mark our age—
What we achieved to challenge praise,
Through the long line of future days—
This let them read, and hence instruction draw:

Here found the virtues rest,
Faith link'd with Love, and Liberty with Law."

The tree of deepest root is found
Least willing still to leave the ground;
'Twas therefore said, by ancient sages,
That love of life increased with years
So much, that in our latter stages,
When pain grows sharp and sickness rages,
The greatest love of life appears.

At last they steal us from ourselves away.
